HISTORICAL

The Century was founded and its first Constitution adopted on January 13, 1847. One hundred gentlemen engaged or interested in Letters and the Fine Arts had been invited to join in forming the Association. Forty-two accepted the invitation and became Founders; forty-six others joined during the year. The name, suggested by the number originally invited to be members, was the proposal of Edgar S. Van Winkle.

On March 7, 1857, the Association was incorporated by an Act of the Legislature, which was amended on March 29, 1883.

During its early years, The Century occupied rooms at 495 Broadway from the spring of 1847 to the spring of 1849, at 435 Broome Street to the spring of 1850, and at 575 Broadway until May, 1852.

By this time, it required a house and moved to 24 Clinton Place (now 46 East Eighth Street). This was its home until the spring of 1857, when it made another move, to a house at 109 (old number 42) East Fifteenth Street. On January 10, 1891, it occupied its present Clubhouse at 7 West 43rd Street.

Successive amendments to the Constitution fixed the limit of resident membership as follows: March 5, 1853, 200 members; March 7, 1857, 250; May 7, 1859, 350; February 1, 1862, 400; April 7, 1866, 500; February 6, 1875, 600; December 5, 1885, 700; May 3, 1890, 800; February 6, 1892, 1000. The limit of non-resident membership has been fixed as follows: February 6, 1892, 300; December 3, 1921, 400; January 14, 1928, 500; June 3, 1941, 600; March 1, 1945, 700; April 3, 1958, 800.

The lamp that burns at each meeting of The Century was designed in 1858 for The Column, a literary society founded in 1825. It was lighted at all subsequent meetings of The Column until Centurions John Bigelow and Parke Godwin, the only surviving members of that organization, presented it to The Century in 1901 as "a silver symbol intended to be a lasting memorial to The Column." They also presented to "all present and future members" of The Century the privileges of fellow-membership with them. The minutes of their meeting concluded, "The Column then adjourned sine die." Today, more than one hundred years later, the lamp still burns.

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MANAGEMENT

THE Board of Management submits the following report for the year 1959:

FROM THE COMMITTEE ON ART

THE Exhibitions of the year were as follows:

January 14–February 8: Exhibition of Work by John Carroll

February 11–April 26: Exhibition of Work by John F. Folinsbee

May 6–May 31: Exhibition of Designs for the Theatre by Robert Edmond Jones

June 3–September 27: Retrospective Exhibition of a Variety of Works in the Graphic Arts by T. M. Cleland

October 7–November 1: Autumn Exhibition of Work by Amateur Artist Members

November 4–November 16: Murals Celebrating the Vintage Festival

November 20–January 3: Autumn Exhibition of Work by Artist Members

Again this year the Art Committee made several awards for entries in the Autumn Exhibition of Work by Amateur Artist Members, in place of the Art Committee Medal and the Honorable Mentions that had been given in the past. Silver ash trays from Cartier's were presented to the prize winners: Alfred Bendiner, Hugh de Haven, William A. Gardner, Bronson S. Ray, Leonard J. Robbins, Whitney North Seymour, Jr., and Harvey Stevenson. Henry R. Mallory's water color, Drifting Snow, was voted the most popular work.

In the Autumn Exhibition of Work by Artist Members, the Art Committee Medal was awarded to Randall Davey for his oil painting, Ambulances Grand National. Honorable Mention was awarded to Walter Stuempfig for his oil painting, The Connoisseur, and to Nathaniel Choate for his limestone sculpture, Family Pride. The largest popular vote was cast for Portrait of Robert Frost, an oil painting by Gardner Cox.

During the year, the Association acquired the following works of art:

Bronze Medallion, Maitland Armstrong by Augustus Saint Gaudens, presented by Hamilton Fish Armstrong

Bronze Medallion, Roscoe H. Hupper by Paul Manship, presented by the artist

Oil painting, Portrait of Joseph Hodges Choate by William H. Chase, presented by the grandchildren of Joseph Hodges Choate, seventh president of The Century

Etching, Male Nude Bathing by Grant Wood, presented by Bethuel M. Webster

Oil painting, Still Life with Fruit, Flowers, and Parrot, artist unknown, bequeathed by Charles C. Burlingham

Etching, Venetian Filigree by John Taylor Arms, presented by William Adams Delano

The following works from the Association's collection were loaned:

To the American Federation of Arts and Letters, Westover Virginia by Edward L. Henry

To the Adirondack Museum, Eliphalet Terry Fishing from a Boat by Winslow Homer

A complete new appraisal of the pictures belonging to the Club was made and the insurance on them brought up to date. All pictures in storage were removed from the unlovely depths of the cellar and placed in proper racks constructed by our engineer, Mr. Henry La Plante, in the new storeroom designed by Lewis G. Adams at the west end of the Billiard Room, which at long last also provides adequate space for the handling of exhibits.

Barry Faulkner, Chairman

FROM THE COMMITTEE ON LITERATURE

DURING his brief tenure as librarian at the Century, Mr. Henry James, Jr., recommended additional lamps. They arrived early in the year and were placed to advantage for both reading and the better appearance of the library. The former librarian also recommended circulation of books for the benefit of members. This was instituted during the year on a limited and experimental scale without, however, interfering with the long-time and useful reserves for regular readers.

The present librarian, Mr. Lewis H. Webster, and his assistant, Mr. Andrew Zaremba, accomplished extensive re-shelving and cataloguing, but the end is not yet! For the most part, the classification system in use was retained. Many books can still be found in the same general areas as formerly, except for large and necessary changes in the lobby of the third floor. To simplify matters, the catch-all classification, "Miscellaneous, by Author," has been dropped entirely.

In the Spring there was a special show-case exhibit on the stairways to the Gallery. It was arranged in connection with the reception for members of the Cosmopolitan Club. The subject was "Century Treasures, Fourteenth through Nineteenth Centuries," and the books were selected from those in the vault and rarely on view. Later show-case exhibits included "Autumnal Poems and Pictures" and "Less Familiar Nativity Representations"—making use of the extensive book resources of the Association.

Of statistical interest are the following items. By the end of 1959, the total holdings of the Century library amounted to 18,357 volumes. The accessions during the year came to 515 volumes, with 406 of them by purchase, 109 by donation; books by Centurions, or with some other Century connection, numbered 85. The annual subscriptions for magazines also happened to number 85.

The Association has been enriched by the acquisition of a third album of stamps belonging to Theodore E. Steinway. This was the one upon which he was working at the time of his death. All three albums contain stamps which have associations with the Century.

As a special project for the future, it is planned to enlarge and bring up to date the poetry collection in the Graham Room. Some of the recent accessions in architecture are serving to round out the collection in the Platt Room. Space limitations, however, prevent the development of any extensive research collections.

William L. Savage, Chairman

FROM THE HOUSE COMMITTEE

THE year 1959 marked the first in which the terms of the appointive Committees changed in mid-stream, or June. For the House Committee this meant that the wonderfully able Richard A. Kimball relinquished his Chairmanship. His appointment as the Director of The American Academy in Rome precluded our retaining his services. The stalwart and loyal members of the House Committee have given the succeeding Chairmen every support and assistance, for which he is pleased to express his gratitude.

The alteration of the nearby Morgan Guaranty Bank Building caused radical change in our normal summer routines in the Clubhouse. The North Terrace was completely untenable, and as a substitute for this oasis, the West Room on the Second Floor was decorated, under the direction of Donald Oenslager, with gay hangings, summer furniture, slipcovers, and a setting of palms around the famous Wolf. Comments on this change varied!

This room was also provided with two large air-conditioning units, which effectively cooled it. The success of this experiment appeared to warrant the purchase of other cooling units for the Main Dining Room and the Graham Library, and the advent of this refrigeration brought a strong appeal, actually mounting to a demand, that the Billiard Room be similarly treated. The House Committee and the Board of Management capitulated, and that room also was made a bit more comfortable during the summer weather.

The following is a brief account of the year's program at the Monthly Dinners. In January, Laurence E. Le Sueur spoke admirably on "News, Present and Future"; in February, Homer A. Thompson in a fascinating lecture on "The Athenian Agora," illustrated with beautiful slides in full color, gave us some idea of the enthralling job of the modern archaeologist. In March, Geoffrey T. Hellman advised us with his usual wit on "How to Write for The New Yorker."

In April, Alvin Eurich told us of "New Tools for Learning," which undoubtedly made many of us wish to be young enough to start all over. In May, Robert L. Crowell described in a charming talk his adventures in "Following the Trial of Henry David Thoreau" in these modern times. In accordance with custom, there was no speaker at the June meeting.

In October, at the Dinner of Welcome, the new members were addressed by Adriaan J. Barnouw, who recalled in a delightful speech many incidents and personages in the history of The Century. The November Meeting was again the Wine Festival under the splendid direction of Henry Allen Moe, and illustrated as in the past by the remarkable posters made for this occasion by our professional artist members. President Kieffer, with his great knowledge of viniculture, delighted us with his remarks. In December, we were highly entertained by a film, "The Gooney Birds of Wake Island," which was supplied by John H. Baker and the National Audubon Society.

On behalf of the Association, the House Committee records its thanks for the following gifts made during the year: maple syrup from Walter H. Kilham, Jr.; two electric razors from Jacques Barzun; fresh Canadian salmon from Shirley C. Fisk; and fresh trout from Edward R. Finch. An unusual cowskin lampshade, decorated with a painting of a Cambodian Temple, was presented to the Association by the Magistrate Hell Sumpha of Cambodia, through our member John Farrar. Finally, as a bequest of the late C. C. Burlingham, The Century received an antique sideboard.

The House Committee again desires to commend the staff of the Clubhouse for its loyal and courteous service throughout the year.

Francis W. Roudebush, Chairman

FROM THE COMMITTEE ON MUSIC

ON the first of June the present Chairman of the Music Committee succeeded John E. Lockwood in that post.

During the year the following programs were presented:
Saturday, January 10: The late Mack Harrell, in a lieder recital.

Saturday, February 7: The Saidenberg Chamber Concert, attended by an overflow audience which filled the Gallery and sat on the stairs and up on the second floor.

Saturday, December 19: The Hamilton College Choir and Brass Ensemble, in a program of Christmas music conducted by John L. Baldwin, Jr. The afternoon's performances included some music by a Centurion and some excellent egg nog composed by Mr. Marchand. The large audience was enthusiastic.

George Mead, Jr., Chairman

FROM THE COMMITTEE ON HONORS

Recommendation to Board of Management: The Committee, on January 27, 1959, recommended that consideration be given to the presentation of the name of Learned Hand, a Centurion for over fifty years, to the members of the Association for Honorary Membership. This, the highest honor that may be bestowed upon members of the Century Association, is an encomium awarded only to those who have rendered distinguished public service, as well as service to the Association. The Board acted favorably upon the Committee's recommendation. At the Monthly Meeting of the Association on April 9, Judge Hand was unanimously elected; he is the twenty-second Centurion thus to be honored. An engrossed testimonial was presented to him by President Kieffer at the Monthly Meeting on May 7.

Recommendation respecting pewter beer mugs: The Committee, in consideration of the fact that the Association is in possession of fifty-eight (58) silver cups, memorials to deceased Centurions, deemed it appropriate to suggest to the Board of Management that hereafter such memorials be in the form of pewter mugs. The Board subsequently approved this recommendation. Mugs, of approved design, may be obtained from Black, Starr and Gorham (price $10.00 plus tax—lettering extra). The name of the late Centurion, together with the year of the beginning of his membership and the year of his death, should be inscribed appropriately on the mug. The first mug was inscribed to the memory of Mahonri M. Young, the second to George W. Martin.

Gilmore D. Clarke, Chairman

OTHER MATTERS

Caveat on Publicity. At the request of the House Committee, the November issue of the Bulletin included the following reminder concerning certain matters of Century policy:

- To avoid the possibility that the Century's name shall become involved in controversy, members should refrain from using the address of the Club on any letter or other paper intended to be printed or published, or for the dispatch or receipt of communications in connection with political or other public discussions.
- Members should take all reasonable steps to prevent any public mention of the Association in connection with any meetings that may be held in the Clubhouse.
- The rule against the admission of reporters and news photographers to the Clubhouse applies to the private dining rooms as well as to other parts of the building.
- As the Century is essentially a place where the amateurs of arts and letters and the professionals can hold amiable converse, it is suggested that business conferences be held in the Club's private rooms.

Daniel's Memoirs. Copies of "My Memories of The Century Club, 1919-1958" by William Daniel, Head Doorman of The Century, arrived from the printer in May. In its pages, Daniel tells of the comings and goings, the conversations and habits, the traits and foibles of Centurions as he recalls them during his almost forty years as a member of the Clubhouse staff. The book is a useful and entertaining contribution to Century lore.

§ 4. The Board of Management shall have the power to remit the dues of any member, for such cause and for such period as in their judgment may be advisable and proper. During that period such member shall not be counted in the limitation of members. [Amended December 3, 1921.]

ARTICLE V

OF COMMITTEES AND THEIR DUTIES

§ 1. Committee on Admissions. The Committee on Admissions shall consist of twenty-one members, who shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting, and shall hold office until their successors shall be elected. At the annual meeting in January, 1889, seven members of the Committee shall be elected to serve three years, seven two years, and seven one year. At each subsequent annual meeting seven members shall be chosen to serve three years. No member of the Committee shall be eligible for re-election within one year of the expiration of three years' service on said Committee. Vacancies by death, or otherwise, may be filled by the Committee until the next annual meeting. They shall fix their own time and place of meeting. Eleven members shall constitute a quorum.

§ 2. Other Committees. There shall be a House Committee and a Committee on Literature, each composed of three members of the Board of Management. There shall be an Art Committee composed of at least seven members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Board of Management. These Committees shall be appointed by the Board of Management within two weeks after each annual meeting. The Board may provide for the appointment of additional members of any of said Committees from time to time; such additional members need not be members of the Board. The particular duties of each of said Committees shall be defined by the By-Laws. [Amended March 3, 1934.]

ARTICLE VI

OF THE MEMBERS

§ 1. The number of resident members is limited to one thousand. [Amended February 6, 1892.]

§ 2. There shall also be a class of non-resident members, not exceeding eight hundred in number, to consist of persons residing permanently more than fifty miles from New York City Hall, and having no office or place of business in New York. [Amended April 3, 1958.]

§ 3. Any member who, having paid the entrance fee and the dues for one year, is absent from the United States for a continuous period of not less than twelve months shall, during his absence, be exempt from the payment of dues, provided that he shall have given to the Treasurer previous notice in writing of his intention to be absent. Absent members shall not be counted in the limitation of the number of members. In case the return of an absent member shall increase the number in his class of membership above the limit prescribed, no new member in that class shall be elected until the number shall be reduced by resignation or otherwise below such limit. [Amended April 3, 1958.]

All members of the Armed Forces of the United States, who are now members or who may be elected to membership, may at their option be held to be non-resident members during their active service. [Amended March 1, 1945.]

An artist member who has paid an entrance fee as a resident member may at his option elect to be classified as a non-resident member and be liable for annual dues as such but shall remain entitled to all the privileges of the Association, including the right of voting and of holding office. [Amended April 3, 1947.]

§ 4. No person shall be admitted as a member of the Association unless he shall have been recommended by the Committee on Admissions, on the proposal of two members not belonging to that Committee.

The name of every person proposed for admission, whether as a resident or a non-resident member, with his residence and the names of the members proposing him, shall be posted in the rooms at least fifteen days before being acted upon by the Committee. The Committee shall receive and consider all communications in reference to the persons proposed, and make careful examination as to their qualifications; it shall pass upon each name separately, and two negative votes shall be a rejection of the candidate. The proceedings of the Committee shall be secret and confidential.

At every monthly meeting of the Association the Committee shall furnish printed lists, properly classified, of the names of the persons recommended for admission, not exceeding twenty in number, and the Association shall then proceed to vote by depositing the lists with tellers appointed by the Chairman. The erasure from the list of any name shall be considered a vote in the negative. If negative votes be cast against any candidate to the number of one-fifth of the votes cast, his candidacy shall be referred back to the Committee on Admissions for further consideration. If the candidacy of such person again comes before the Association, negative votes cast against such person to the number of one-fifth of the votes cast shall exclude him from membership. [Amended January 8, 1953.]

No person so excluded shall be eligible for election within twelve months thereafter.

§ 5. Non-resident members may at any time, on and after the 30th April, 1896, be transferred from the list of resident members upon application in writing to the Treasurer. The members so transferred shall not be entitled to reimbursement of any part of the entrance fee. [Amended February 1896.]

Non-resident members shall be entitled to all the privileges of the Association, except the right of voting and of holding office. They shall be subject to the Constitution and By-Laws and to all the regulations of the Association.

§ 6. The Secretary and Treasurer, two weeks previous to each monthly meeting, shall determine the number of vacancies in each class of members and certify the same to the Committee on Admissions.

§ 7. An entrance fee of one hundred and fifty dollars shall be paid by each resident member, and of one hundred dollars by each non-resident member.

Such payment shall be made within thirty days after notice in writing of his election; or if within thirty days after such notice the member gives written notice to the Treasurer of his desire to do so, such payment may be made in four instalments, each of one quarter of the amount of the entrance fee; the first instalment shall be payable within thirty days after notice of his election, the second instalment within six months after such notice, the third instalment within twelve months after such notice, and the fourth instalment within eighteen months after such notice.

In default of such payment of the entrance fee, or the first instalment thereof, within thirty days after such notice, the member shall be deemed to have declined his election unless the Board of Management determines otherwise.

If any member fails to pay a subsequent instalment of his entrance fee when due, he shall be notified thereof in writing, and unless such instalment shall be paid within one month after such notice he shall thereupon cease to be a member unless the Board of Management determines otherwise. [Amended January 14, 1939.]

§ 8. The annual dues of resident members shall be one hundred fifty dollars, payable semi-annually in advance on the first days of May and November; and the annual dues of non-resident members shall be seventy-five dollars, payable on admission, and on each first day of May thereafter. [Amended April 2, 1959.]

The dues of all newly-elected members shall be computed proportionally from the first day of the month succeeding their election.

When the dues of any member shall remain unpaid for the space of three months, the Treasurer shall cause him to be notified that, unless the same be paid within one month thereafter, his membership will cease; and in case such dues shall not be paid pursuant to such notice, or such default be accounted for to the Board of Management, he shall thereupon cease to be a member.

In case any member of the non-resident class other than an artist member shall come to reside within the radius above named, or shall establish an office or place of business in the City of New York, it shall be his duty forthwith to notify the Treasurer of the Association in writing of such change, and he shall then be deemed a resident member with annual dues accordingly, and unless he has already paid the entrance fee of a resident member, he shall also pay to the Treasurer within thirty days the additional amount of entrance fees necessary to constitute him a resident member; in default of such payment he shall cease to be a member. [Amended March 6, 1947.]

It shall be the duty of each member to keep the Treasurer informed of his address.

§ 9. Honorary members may be elected from the membership of the Association on the recommendation of the Board of Management, at a regular monthly meeting, by an affirmative vote by ballot of not less than nine-tenths of the votes cast. No more than one honorary member shall be chosen in any one year. Honorary members shall be exempt from the payment of annual dues and shall be entitled to all the privileges of the Association except that of holding office. [Amended, April 5, 1956.]

§ 10. Any member may be suspended or expelled for violation of the Constitution or By-Laws, or for any offence or misconduct which may be deemed sufficient to warrant such suspension or expulsion, by a vote, at a monthly meeting, of three-fourths of the members present, one month's previous notice having been given to the member charged. It shall be the duty of the Board of Management to report any member for action under this rule.

The Board of Management shall also have the power for a like cause, by the affirmative vote of eleven (11) of its members, after a hearing has been granted on one month's previous notice, to suspend any member from all privileges as such member indefinitely, pending further action; but any member affected thereby may require the resolution of suspension to be reported to the Association.

Membership may also be forfeited by failure to pay any indebtedness to the Association, in such manner as may be prescribed by the By-Laws.

§ 11. In the rooms of the Association, betting of any kind is strictly prohibited. [Amended November 5, 1927.]

OF MEETINGS

§ 1. There shall be an annual meeting of the Association for the election of officers and members and other business. It shall be held on the second Thursday of January of each year, at 9 o'clock P.M.

§ 2. There shall be monthly meetings of the Association for the election of members and other business. They shall be held on the first Thursday of November, December, February, March, April, May and June at 9 o'clock P.M. [Amended June 3, 1941.]

§ 3. Special meetings may be called by the Board of Management; and they shall call a meeting at any time on the written request of ten members, which request shall specify the object of the meeting.

§ 4. The number of members necessary to constitute a quorum at an annual meeting shall be fifty, and at a monthly or special meeting shall be thirty.

ARTICLE VIII

OF AMENDMENTS

§ 1. This Constitution shall commence and take effect on the second Saturday of January, 1870, and the previous Constitution thereupon shall cease.

§ 2. No alteration or amendment of this Constitution shall be made unless the same be proposed at a previous regular meeting, and then posted in a conspicuous place in the rooms of the Association and the text of the same sent to each voting member with the notice of the meeting at which it may be considered, and be finally adopted at a subsequent meeting by the votes of two-thirds of the members present at the passage thereof.

§ 3. By-Laws, Rules, and Regulations, not inconsistent with the Charter or this Constitution, may be made, adopted, altered, or repealed at any monthly or annual meeting; provided, the proposed by-law, rule, regulation, alteration, or repeal shall have been proposed at a previous monthly meeting, and then posted in a conspicuous place in the rooms of the Association and the text of the same sent to each voting member with the notice of the meeting at which it may be considered, and shall be adopted by the votes of two-thirds of the members present at the passage thereof.

BY-LAWS

§ 1. No book, journal, paper, picture, statue, or other work of art, the property of the Association, shall be taken from the rooms, under any pretext whatever, except by authority of the Board of Management.

§ 2. On the first day of each month or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, there shall be sent to each member notice of his indebtedness to the Association on the last day of the preceding month, and if the same is not paid on or before the fifteenth day of the month the names of the members so in default, together with the amounts due, shall be posted on a separate sheet in the hall.

In case any such indebtedness shall not be discharged at the expiration of a month from the date of such first notice, a second notice shall be mailed to the member in default, notifying him that further credit will not be extended to him until his indebtedness is discharged, and that in case he continues in such default for ten days thereafter, he will be excluded from all privileges of the Association until such indebtedness is paid, and such member shall thereupon, upon the expiration of such ten days, be so excluded, and notice to that effect shall thereupon be posted on a separate sheet in the hall.

At any time during such exclusion the Board of Management may declare the membership of such delinquent to be forfeited, and his name shall thereupon be dropped from the roll of members.

But before such action shall be taken by the Board of Management, it shall cause a copy of this By-Law to be mailed to the delinquent member.

A copy of this By-Law shall be sent with such second notice.

§ 3. A suggestion book shall be kept at the rooms in which every member is authorized to enter, under his signature, any complaint as to the management of the Association, and any suggestions he may desire to make.

§ 4. Visitors:

(a) A member may introduce a guest to the rooms of the Association for one day by entering the name and address of such guest and the date in the book to be kept for that purpose. This privilege may be suspended for any particular day by the House Committee. A member may not introduce the same person as a daily guest more than twice in the calendar year, and may not introduce more than one daily guest on the same day.

(b) A member may invite visitors to the Art Gallery during any Art Exhibition of the Association through signing cards of invitation printed for that purpose, but such cards of invitation shall not entitle visitors to pass to other parts of the house.

(c) A member may introduce guests to the private dining room when he has reserved that room for an entertainment.

(d) The House Committee, at the request in writing of a member, may extend the privileges of the Association for a total period of one month in any twelve months to a guest whose residence is more than fifty miles from the City Hall. Extension of this time may, on the recommendation of the House Committee, be granted by the Board of Management

A member may not obtain from the House Committee such privileges for more than one guest at a time, nor for the same guest more than once in a period of twelve months. Guest privileges extended by the House Committee or on its recommendation may be terminated at the discretion of the Committee at any time. [Amended May 6, 1954.]

(e) Guests to whom the privileges of the Association are extended under Section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution or under paragraphs (a), (d), or (j) of this By-law are on the same footing as non-resident members, except that those to whom the privileges are extended under paragraphs (a) and (d) may not introduce visitors and except that no guest may be present at any business meeting of the Association. Nor shall the House Committee grant the same privileges to the same guest more than once in a period of twelve months. [Amended March 5, 1959.]

(f) A member who obtains admission to the club-house for a guest becomes responsible for the conduct of such guest and for any indebtedness of such guest to the Association.

(g) The Board of Management may modify these rules to meet special cases.

(h) It is the duty of the House Committee to enforce the provisions of this section and promptly to report to the Board of Management all cases of persistent violation thereof.

(i) In case of violation of any of the provisions of this section, the House Committee may summarily suspend the privileges accorded therein with regard to any member or visitor for a period not exceeding ten days, and in all cases of violation the Board of Management may suspend such privileges for such period as in their discretion the interest of the Association may require.

(j) In addition to the powers herein above granted, the Board of Management may provide for the invitation of authors, artists, and composers of music to be guests of the Association. Such invitations shall be for the term of one year but shall be renewable; and the total number so invited shall not exceed fifty at any one time. [Amended November 5, 1942.]

§ 5. The House Committee shall have the charge of furnishing supplies, employing stewards and servants, keeping the rooms and premises of the Association in order for use, regulating the place, character and the extent of recreation and amusements in the club-house, and enforcing the rule as to admission of visitors. [Amended November 5, 1927.]

The care of newspapers and current periodicals is entrusted to the House Committee.

§ 6. The Committee on Literature shall have charge of the Library, and of the supply of books, and shall subscribe for periodicals and newspapers. Loud or continuous conversation shall not be carried on in the Library, nor, except on Thursday nights, shall refreshments be served therein.

§ 7. The Committee on Art shall have charge of all works of art owned or possessed by the Association; and it shall be their duty to make arrangements for exhibition, at monthly and annual meetings, of the works of artists of the Association, and other works of art, at their discretion. They shall keep a catalogue of the works of art owned or possessed by the Association, or exhibited in its rooms, and shall record therein every such work, with the name of the author, the title of the work, and the time of exhibition. The Committee on Art shall have charge of all decorations of the rooms. No work of art shall be accepted as a gift, or purchased by the Association, until the Committee on Art has made a report thereon to the Board of Management.

§ 8. The expenditures of the House Committee, and the Committees on Literature and Art, shall be limited to such sums as the Board of Management shall prescribe.

§ 9. A perfect list of members, officers, and committees shall be kept posted up in the rooms of the Association; and such list shall be corrected under the direction of the Treasurer and Secretary, from time to time, as changes occur.

§ 10. The above By-Laws shall go into effect on the second Saturday of January, 1870.

§ 11. A Nominating Committee shall annually be constituted as follows. The Board of Management shall at its last spring meeting propose as candidates for such committee the names of seven members of the Club, of whom two shall be members of the Board of Management, not eligible for re-election, and two shall be members of the Committee on Admissions. The names shall be posted in the club-house at least twenty days before the November monthly meeting of the Club. At any time not later than ten days before the November monthly meeting, additional candidates may be proposed for the Committee, provided that in each case the proposal, indorsed by twenty-five resident members, be presented in writing to the Secretary of the Club. [Amended May 1, 1952.]

All the names proposed by either of the above methods shall be printed in a single list, the names proposed by the Board of Management being designated by an asterisk. From this list, which shall be distributed at the monthly meeting in November, the Club shall elect by ballot the Nominating Committee. Each member may vote for not more than seven names on the list, and the seven candidates receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected. [Amended May 1, 1952.]

The Nominating Committee shall at the earliest practicable moment post in the club-house the names of candidates for all the positions to be filled. Additional candidates for such positions or any of them, may be nominated, and shall be posted, provided that in each case the nomination, indorsed by fifty resident members, be presented in writing to the Secretary of the Club not later than one week before the Annual Meeting.

The Secretary of the Club shall prepare printed lists of all candidates named by either of the aforesaid methods, the names to be grouped under the titles of the positions to be filled; the candidates for Trustees to be arranged in three groups, designated respectively as Authors, Artists, and Amateurs, and all names proposed by the Nominating Committee to be designated by an asterisk. These lists shall be distributed to members at the Annual Meeting, and shall serve as ballots in the election, provided that nothing herein be construed to restrict the right of any member to vote by means of written names for persons whose names do not appear in print.

§ 12. An Investment Committee consisting of four members and the Treasurer shall be appointed by the Board of Management annually. It shall be the duty of this committee to supervise the investments of the Club and to advise the Treasurer with respect to the purchase and sale of its investments.

REQUIREMENTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON ADMISSIONS

FOR the guidance of members of the Association, the Year-Book contains the Requirements of the Committee and the extract from the Committee's minutes concerning the interpretation of "amateurs of letters and the fine arts."

With respect to letters concerning candidates, the members of the Association are requested to send to the Committee such information, whether favorable or unfavorable, as they feel will assist in the consideration of a candidate. Article I of the Constitution declares: "This Association shall be composed of authors, artists, and amateurs of letters and the fine arts." The mere endorsement of a name is of little help to the Committee in determining whether a candidate, whatever his vocation, has such breadth of interest and qualities of mind as would make him a sympathetic, stimulating, and congenial companion in such a society.

Members are requested not to propose, second, or endorse more than one candidate in any one letter.

All communications are confidential. After final action has been taken on a candidate, letters unfavorable to him are returned to their writers by registered mail. The letters of proposers and seconders are deposited in the archives, and all other letters are destroyed, except that, by a two-thirds vote of the Committee, any particular letter may be preserved in the archives. "The proceedings of the Committee shall be secret and confidential." (Constitution, Article VI)

REQUIREMENTS OF THE COMMITTEE

1. The proposer must write to the Committee, stating the name, address, and qualifications of the candidate. The letter should convey definite information as to the candidate's background, vocation, attainments, character, and personality. If he is not an artist or an author, it should also give evidence as to those interests and tastes outside of his vocation which would make him a sympathetic, stimulating, and congenial companion in a society of artists and authors.
2. The seconder must also write to the Committee in regard to the candidate. The letter should contain information of a character similar to that outlined for the proposer's letter.
3. The name, address, and vocation * of the candidate shall be entered in the Candidates' Book, preferably by the proposer and seconder, with their signatures. The Secretary of the Committee may make such entry when the letters of recommendation have been received from both proposer and seconder. A candidacy is not completed until these letters have been received and the entry has been made.
4. The candidate must be known to at least two members of the Committee if he is a candidate for resident membership or to at least one member if he is a candidate for non-resident membership. To facilitate the introduction of candidates to members of the Committee, proposers and seconders are asked to get in touch with the Chairman of the Sub-Committee to which the candidate has been assigned.

* The Committee on Admissions has long interpreted the term "amateur" as relating to "breadth of interest and qualities of mind and imagination" rather than to "occupation." It therefore suggests to proposers that in filling the space (in the Candidates' Book) designated "occupation," they use some term other than "amateur" to describe the candidate's "profession or occupation," in compliance with Rule I of the Committee, as adopted by the Association.

5. The Committee must receive, in addition to the letters of the proposer and seconder, at least ten letters from other members of the Association concerning a candidate for resident membership or at least six letters concerning a candidate for non-resident membership. These letters should do more than merely endorse a candidate; they should contain information which will be a source of enlightenment to the Committee as to the candidate's qualifications.

"AMATEURS OF LETTERS AND THE FINE ARTS"

[From the Minutes of the Committee on Admissions, January 3, 1923]

Your special Committee appointed to consider the difficulties that have lately developed within the Admissions Committee over the interpretation of the word "amateur" in Article I of the Constitution, and to report on a suggestion that Article I should be amended, has made inquiries, has considered, and now reports.

We find that for more than sixty years the Committee on Admissions has been guided in passing upon qualifications of candidates not by such a narrow interpretation of the words "amateurs of letters and the fine arts" as would have required candidates to be experts or connoisseurs, but rather by the view that those words as used in the Constitution were intended to admit gentlemen of any occupation provided their breadth of interest and qualities of mind and imagination made them sympathetic, stimulating, and congenial companions in a society of authors and artists. We believe that this construction has long been clearly expressed through the Century's membership, and that the Admissions Committee may now regard it as being sanctioned and established by long usage and tradition. Consequently, we also think that the Admissions Committee need not hesitate to govern itself accordingly, and need not call upon the Club to undertake the difficult task of formulating a precise definition of the word "amateur."

On the other hand, we see no reason why it should not be admitted here that the Admissions Committee has erred in particular cases. It seems better to recognize this than to let anyone suppose that mistakes are to be accepted as precedents for a lax standard. This is stated because confusion has lately resulted from just that supposition.

The Admissions Committee should make it clear to all its members that it intends to interpret "amateur" very broadly, but never to interpret it so loosely as to cover candidates who do not clearly possess what may be called a responsive sympathy with letters and the fine arts, no matter how eminent or successful they may be, no matter how respectable socially, or how deserving of recognition on special grounds. It is understood that the writer of a technical treatise is not such an "author" as the Constitution intends; similarly, a mere collector, no matter how untiring, might well stand outside our broadest interpretations of "amateur." We do not want spiritual mediocrity. Our standard is obviously hard to define. But if the word "culture" did not sound priggish to some ears, it would perhaps suggest most briefly what the Century requires of a candidate quite apart from any special kind of ability or success.

THE CENTURY MEMORIALS

BY THE HISTORIAN

Wayman Adams

His friends remember the striking contrast between the extreme shyness and modesty of Wayman Adams and the impetuous boldness of his painting. There was consistent integrity in his work. As a portraitist, he was far from what is known as a "society painter" and he never made a concession to the vanity of his sitters. He had an almost uncanny capacity for seeing latent facets of character in his subjects and presenting them on canvas precisely as he saw them. Critics sometimes accused him of "brutal frankness."

Though some of his candid portraits were of his artist friends, he was much loved and respected by his fellow painters. Perhaps, being painters, they were able to see what he saw even in themselves—or, at least, saw it less dimly than vain and pompous laymen could.

His portraiture embraced a wide variety of men and women. There was Governor Allan Shivers of Texas but there was also Bobby Jones, the golfer. Booth Tarkington and John Purroy Mitchel were among his subjects outside the artist sitters, and so was the feminist Clara Driscoll.

Wayman was born in Muncie, Indiana. His first painting, for which he got five dollars, was of a heifer. From Muncie he went for his special education to Indianapolis and studied at the John Herron Art Institute. He continued his studies in Italy and Spain. After he came back, he won the Benjamin Altman prize of $1,000 from the National Academy of Design for a painting entitled "108 West 57th Street."

Until 1948 he lived in New York City and in Elizabethstown, New York, where, with his wife, he maintained an art school. But then he moved to Texas—so that for the last ten years he was rarely at the Century. He is remembered by his fellow Centurions as extremely reticent, as if he believed so deeply that painting was his only true medium of expression that he could give little value to the words that he spoke.

Avery Delano Andrews

General Andrews lived actively in the years most of us only read about. As soldier, lawyer, New York Police Commissioner, and business executive he saw more changes in every field of his endeavor than have taken place in any similar span of time in history. Born during the Civil War, he saw the birth of the telephone, the electric light, the automobile, and the airplane, but he has seen, too, the cold war and satellites in orbit. He was as American as you can be: one direct ancestor landed in Plymouth Colony in 1621, another in Massachusetts Bay in 1635.

Avery Andrews was graduated from West Point in 1886 and commissioned a second lieutenant in the Fifth United States Artillery. While in the army he studied law at Columbian (later George Washington) University and took his degree of LL.B. in 1891. The following year he got another bachelor's degree from New York Law School. Evidently in those years of peace this departure from rigid duty as an army officer was possible, but it was certainly unusual.

From the time he resigned from the army in 1895, Andrews's interests expressed themselves in many fields, and he achieved triumphs in military, legal, business, and governmental activities. For three years after leaving the army he was New York City's Police Commissioner. His most celebrated contribution to the effectiveness of the force was his organization of the first bicycle squad, whose duty was to stop runaways. At the same time, he never quite left the military as he was active in the national guard of New York. In 1898 he was briefly in command of Squadron A, but in the summer of that year the Spanish War drew him back into the armed forces. He served as lieutenant colonel of volunteers on the staff of Major General James H. Wilson, U.S.A., until the war was over. In 1899 he was appointed adjutant general of the State of New York with the rank of governor general.

In the First World War he was assistant chief of General Pershing's staff in France. But in the intervals of his military career he found time for legal and business activities. He practiced law with the firm of Wells and Andrews, he was the representative in the United States of the Royal Petroleum Company of Holland and the Shell Transport and Trading Company of London, and he was director of the Irving Trust Company of New York, the Central-Penn National Bank of Philadelphia, and the Shell Union Oil Corporation.

He was a Centurion for sixty-three of his ninety-five years.

Montgomery Boynton Angell

A Centurion friend of "Monty" Angell writes that "the qualities which made him a joyous companion were his instant responses, his mind well stocked with the thoughts of the best writers throughout the ages, an understanding and pleasure in the creations of artists in many fields, an objective appraisal of controversial issues in matters civic and personal, a felicity of expression, a keen sense of humor which tempered his conclusions to the thin, thin sensitivity of any belligerent opponent.”

Montgomery Angell was born in Rochester, New York, in 1889. He was graduated from Princeton in 1911, having been a member of the hockey team in his undergraduate days. In 1915 he took his law degree at the Harvard Law School, where he was treasurer and an editor of the Harvard Law Review. The year he left Harvard he joined the Interstate Commerce Commission and served there until the United States entered the First World War.

In the army he was an infantry major in combat overseas. He won the Croix de Guerre with Gold Star and a French Army Corps Citation.

In the Treasury Department after the war he served as a tax expert until he entered the general counsel's office of the Federal Reserve Board.

Coming to New York early in the 1920's, he joined the law firm which eventually became Davis, Polk, Wardwell, Sunderland and Kiendl. At his death he was a senior partner of this firm. During this time he published articles in legal periodicals and lectured at the Practising Law Institute.

His membership in the Century dates from 1933.

Reginald Rowan Belknap

Even if they did not know him, Centurions were impressed by the look of Reginald Belknap with his erect bearing, his fine head, and his keen, steady blue eyes. If they inquired about him, as they usually did, they were told that he was one of the navy's oldest living admirals, a veteran of the Spanish-American War. And even before that he served in the Asiatic station during the war between China and Japan from 1894 to 1896.

The high point of Admiral Belknap's career was his remarkable performance in the First World War, when he commanded the mine-laying squadron which laid 56,571 mines that formed four-fifths of the 230 x 23 mile field between the Orkney Islands and Norway. This operation, in 1918, was described in the report of Secretary Josephus Daniels as "the outstanding anti-submarine offensive product of the year." In recognition of this feat, which had required ten ships in fifteen expeditions, he was promoted to rear admiral by special act of Congress.

Ten years before this North Sea operation he had performed an act of humane service in the Mediterranean. After the Messina earthquake in 1908 he commanded the Red Cross ship Bayern which brought supplies for the construction of buildings for the temporary housing of some 16,000 people whose homes had been destroyed. For this he was awarded the American Red Cross Gold Medal.

Reginald Belknap was born at Malden, Massachusetts, in 1873. His father was Admiral George Eugene Belknap, a Civil War veteran and later an oceanographer. Reginald got his commission as ensign at the age of twenty. In the war with Spain he was transferred from the Asiatic base and served as flag secretary to the commander of the Key West Naval Base. During the Philippine Insurrection, he was again sent to the Pacific where he was flag secretary to the commander-in-chief, Asiatic station. For three years after 1907 he was naval attaché at embassies in Berlin, Rome, and Vienna. During his naval career he received the Navy Distinguished Service Medal and officer decorations of the Belgian Order of Leopold and the French Legion of Honor.

Upon his retirement in 1927 he became deeply interested in church work. He was a prominent Episcopalian layman. He was vestryman, then junior warden of Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church in New York. He was a member of the board of managers of the Seamen's Church Institute, a president of the American Church Union, and a chairman of the Layman's National Committee.

In recognition of his far-flung activities, he was made president of that extremely exclusive and fascinating institution The Ends of the Earth Club. It was, of course, natural that the club's membership should include several Centurions.

A non-resident member of the Century, the admiral came to lunch at the club about once every two weeks. Sometimes, of an evening, he would join a group at the Round Table, where he was always welcome. As long as they live, those Centurions who knew Reginald Belknap will be proud of their memory of him.

Walter Lawrence Bogert

Walter Bogert was a teacher of music, a lecturer on the history and appreciation of music, an occasional conductor, and a singer. He was also, for a time, a practicing lawyer. With all the distinctions that rewarded his varied efforts, he remained a gentle person, never imposing his views on others or, indeed, talking about himself. He seldom mentioned his music or insisted upon the quite positive opinions he was known to hold. Rather, he would talk about some hobby such as photography which he especially enjoyed. And, in spite of the affliction which overtook him in later years, his happy disposition seemed never to lapse.

He was born ninety-four years ago in Flushing, New York, descended from Dutch ancestors who settled on Long Island in the 1600's. He was educated at Columbia College, from which he graduated in 1888. Two years later he took his LL.B. degree at Columbia Law School. The law, however, was never his first love: his main activity in these years was the study of instrumental and vocal music at the National Conservatory of Music and the Institute of Musical Art. As a result of these studies he became instructor in harmony at the Conservatory. Because of his interpretative skill he was given the post of organist at St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church. In 1903 he took time off to conduct the United States Marine Band in Washington. As a baritone he gave some five hundred recitals.

In 1920 he began to lecture at Yale in what is now known as musicology. At one time he was president of the National Association of Teachers of Singing, and later he was one of its directors. He was a director, too, of the Russian Symphony Society and the MacDowell Club of New York. A less formal post was that of secretary of "The Bohemians," an organization which met once a month at the Harvard Club for a convivial musical evening.

Bogert's closest friends at the Century were Francis Rogers, Willem Willeke, and Theodore Steinway, all of whom he survived. In the earlier days of his membership he would come to the Club and occasionally play informally for the entertainment of whatever members were there. In later years he was unhappily prevented from coming or, indeed, from seeing most of his old friends by a crippling disease which eventually confined him to a wheel chair.

A Centurion friend writes of Walter Bogert: "He was a live and let live sort of fellow with standards of courtesy and forbearance which seem to be old hat in the hurly-burly of the second half of our turbulent century."

Lindsay Bradford

Lindsay was a direct descendent of the minister who led the Pilgrims to America in the Mayflower in 1620 and became Governor William Bradford of the Plymouth Colony. In later years, the Bradfords drifted to New York, and it was there that Lindsay was born in 1892.

He became known to many Centurions when he was appointed to the Board of the American Academy in Rome. His first appearance there both fascinated and frightened most of the other board members. He had, they said, a "wicked gleam in his eye," but they were impressed by his quick, keen intelligence. They came to know his wisdom in the management of their funds, and eventually he endeared himself by what they called his "touch of boyish bravado." He was a handsome man with an abundance of hair which was always straying from the brush. He was a contrast to the common image of the businessman.

Yet businessman he was, very much so. When he retired he was vice-chairman of the board of New York's City Bank Farmers Trust Company. He had been an investment banker since 1914. At his death he was director of some half-dozen corporations. It was this broad experience in finance—especially in connection with trusts—that made him so valuable to the Academy.

Lindsay was educated at Phillips Andover Academy and at Yale. He took his bachelor's degree in 1914. After his graduation he entered the investment banking firm of Hambleton and Company. In the First World War he served as lieutenant junior grade in the navy. From 1919 to 1927 he was with the New York Trust Company and then joined the bank which became the City Bank Farmers Trust Company. He came on the Academy board in 1945.

A fellow Centurion who was also associated with him in the Rome Academy writes: "Lindsay was a spare man of extraordinary energy. He seemed to have plenty left over from his many and large responsibilities to devote to riding, golf, tennis, bridge, chess and other competitive games and sports. He played to win and generally did. He was really a fine gamesman."

He was elected to the Century in 1946.

Arthur Freeman Brinckerhoff

"Brinck," as we always called him, was an architect and a landscape architect and he achieved the peak of his distinguished career in the combination of these professions. He worked mainly in the country and designed homes, schools, institutional buildings, and parks. He was interested, too, in federal housing projects in Staten Island and in Elizabeth, New Jersey, and he became so accomplished in large patterns which involved both building and planting that he was chosen consultant to the board of design of the New York World's Fair in 1939-40. Many gardens on large private estates also bear testimony to his special talents.

He was educated at Cornell, where he received a B.S. degree in architecture in 1902. He began his work as a member of the firm of Vitale, Brinckerhoff and Geiffert. In the First World War he was in the construction division of the army; in the Second World War he was chairman of Artists for Victory.

In 1939 he was spokesman for New York's Fine Arts Federation and was so successful in his presentation of the artists' objections to the plan for a Battery-Brooklyn bridge that the proposal was abandoned and a tunnel was substituted. And he was for a while president of the Federation. He also held directorship of the Municipal Art Society of New York and was at one time chairman of the Society of Landscape Architects. He was awarded the Gold Medal of the Architectural League of New York in 1920 and the Medal of Honor of the National Sculpture Society in 1943. He was a member of the National Academy of Design and the American Institute of Architects. He served as president of the Israel Putnam Memorial camp ground committee of Putnam Park near his home in Redding, Connecticut.

Brinck was a familiar figure at the Century, where he had warm friends. He spent many a long evening in the billiard room and he was a constant attendant at meetings of the Stim Committee. He was a Centurion for thirty-two years. In the last two years we have missed him, for illness kept him much at home away from town.

Lyman Lloyd Bryson

In his book The Next America Lyman Bryson described democracy as "a way of developing the creative differences among men, engineered by free choice and consequence." He conceded that this was an arbitrary definition "in the imperative mode," but he wanted to let it stand for the purposes of his book.

This concept of "creative differences" was in the foreground of Bryson's mind through most of his teaching career. His invention of the "panel," now so popular in radio and television, was intended to present these differences to the public as immediately and dramatically as possible.

Bryson's interest in the discussions based on differences of views and opinions led him into the promotion of adult education, a relatively new institution in America, at least on the scale he envisioned. There were soon a million or more listeners to the CBS program "The People's Platform" which he moderated. It was an ad lib dinner table conversation on current events. This was succeeded by "Invitation to Learning," "School of the Air," "Church of the Air," and "Of Men and Books"—his popularity increasing with each new program. When television came, he took part in "You and the World," which was about the United Nations, and "Lamp Unto My Feet," a program of religion and ethics which still continues.

Bryson confuted the highbrows who said you could not interest people on a low level of education in high-level philosophy and literature and science. He often told about a fan who wrote him that in spite of a minimum of school she easily understood his broadcasts on Bacon's Novum Organum and Darwin's Origin of Species.

Lyman Bryson was born in Valentine, Nebraska, in 1888. He was educated in an Omaha high school and the University of Michigan. In summer vacations he worked as a newspaper reporter in Omaha and Detroit. After taking his M.A. he taught rhetoric and journalism at the University of Michigan. During the First World War he was with the Red Cross and continued with it till 1928. After an interval in California—first as director of the San Diego Museum of Anthropology, then as professor of anthropology in San Diego Teacher's College—he came in 1934 to Teacher's College, Columbia University. In New York he attracted large audiences to his popular Town Hall lectures. At Columbia he established what he called the Readability Laboratory whose function was to re-edit books on economics, sociology, and government so that they would be easy to read. In 1936 he published Adult Education, which today is a standard text.

Bryson was active in the Century. He served on the Board of Management and was chairman of the Committee on Literature. He was especially interested in the preliminary plans for a fifth floor library.

On his death, an editorial in The New York Times said: "He was a man of pleasant and unassuming personality. He was also, as those know who saw him during the years he was fighting his last enemy, his final illness, a man of superb courage. Perhaps the last lesson he taught was to face death with an almost Socratic serenity. His gaiety and enthusiasm remain in memory."

Lyman Bryson's death was a loss to millions of listening and watching Americans. But his life had brought immense gain to the cause of American education.

Oliver Ellsworth Buckley

Bell was one of the pioneers among American industrial laboratories to engage in basic scientific research. Although this activity was defined by a recent government official in this somewhat ungrammatical sentence, "Basic research is when you don't know what you are doing," industrial corporations are giving more and more attention to it as a profitable enterprise. This exploration of the unknown requires the direction of a true scientific mind—which is the explanation of the success of Oliver Buckley in the Bell Laboratories.

Buckley was an engineer and inventor as well as a director of fundamental research. His engineering achievements included the development of high-speed submarine telegraph cables. Two of his inventions were an ionization manometer and a mercury vapor aspirator. His research work began during the First World War, when as major in the Signal Corps he headed a laboratory in Paris. This was, of course, applied research and he did not begin his fundamental studies till he joined the Bell Laboratories in 1925. Then his main interests were acoustics, electronics, photoelectricity, and microphonic effects. He was concerned, however, with every subject that had a possible bearing on communications. It was because of his successful investigations in this area that he was appointed to the communications and guided missile divisions of the National Defense Research Committee in the Second World War.

Doctor Buckley was born in Sloan, Iowa, in 1887. He took his bachelor's degree at Grinnell College in 1909 and his doctorate at Cornell in 1914. Meanwhile, he had taught at both Grinnell and Columbia. He joined the Western Electric Company in 1914. After working in applied research and development there, it was natural for him to go to Bell.

His advance at Bell Laboratories was rapid. In 1933 he was appointed director of research. By 1940 he had become president of the Laboratories. He retired as chairman of the board in 1952. Meanwhile, his membership in professional associations and societies had multiplied. The more important of these were the National Academy of Sciences, the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and the American Institute of Electrical Engineers.

A Centurion associate tells of Buckley's warm enthusiasm in his work: "As the head of Bell Laboratories Oliver was always eager to demonstrate, at various business meetings or conferences, the new gadgets and gimmicks that were coming out of our research. He would stand before his audience with his pockets loaded with all kinds of devices, talk in a rushing sort of way about what was going on, and bring piece after piece out of his pocket to illustrate this or that. When it came time for Oliver to appear on a meeting program, one always knew that he would have on his person as much of his beloved Laboratories as he could carry."

David Chapman Bull

Dave Bull was a Connecticut Yankee whose delicate New England humor was never submerged by his distinction as a doctor and his total dedication to his profession. It was a "quaint humor couched in circumambient phrase"—a happy description given at the memorial service in the chapel of Presbyterian hospital.

Dave was born in Naugatuck, Connecticut, prepared for college at Hotchkiss, and in 1912 received a Ph.B. degree at Yale. Four years later he was given a master's degree in the School of Pure Science at Columbia and in the same year, 1916, earned his M.D. at Columbia's School of Medicine.

In the summer and fall of 1916 he served with Squadron A on the Mexican border. Early the following year he began his internship at Bellevue Hospital, but a few weeks after the United States entered the First World War he was commissioned first lieutenant of Medical Corps in the 12th New York Infantry. In October, 1917, he was transferred to the 107th Infantry and went overseas with that regiment in the spring of 1918. In September he was wounded in action at Ferme Guillemont, France. Later he was promoted to captain and cited in division orders "for exceptional courage and devotion to duty for maintaining a first aid station at the extreme front under very heavy fire for more than twenty hours" and in A.E.F. orders "for distinguished and exceptional gallantry." He was awarded the Purple Heart and the Silver Star. After his discharge from the army, he completed his internship at Presbyterian Hospital in New York.

Dave Bull was both physician and surgeon. He became particularly eminent in the fields of fractures and disabilities of the extremities and in the field of blood transfusion. From 1930 to his death he was instructor and professor of surgery at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, where his lectures were constantly admired. In 1940 his name was submitted to the governor of the State of New York as a specialist-consultant in surgery on boards of the medical preparedness program of the National Defense Plan. He was a founder of the Blood Transfusion Association and served on a committee whose recommendations led to the establishment of the Presbyterian Hospital Blood Bank in 1939.

As a distinguished Centurion colleague says of him: "All in all, Dave was a dear fellow, loved and respected by all who knew him, in and out of his profession."

Henry Jagoe Burchell

Henry Burchell was a kind of ambassador from Italy to the Century Club and sometimes vice-versa. He knew Italy with the intimacy that can only come to one who knows to the most delicate nuance her rhythmic language. But his linguistic gift carried him beyond Italian into the Latin from which it mainly derived and to a love of the classics, including the Greek, and enabled him to become a lecturer and instructor in these subjects at Columbia and Barnard.

A friend says that to walk with Henry Burchell in Venice, Florence, or Rome was to be followed by the ghosts of Renaissance painters, architects, and poets. He was on close and friendly terms with them all. But he was equally friendly with Centurions and enjoyed introducing them to his immortal companions.

He was born in 1869, grew up in New York, and was graduated from Columbia in 1892. After his nine years as instructor, he served as director and secretary of the Italy-America Society and as a director of the Mulberry Community House. In 1928 President Nicholas Murray Butler appointed him director of the Casa Italiana, Italian Cultural Center at the University. During the next two years he reorganized the Casa and prepared it for an international program. In recognition of his contributions to cultural relations between Italy and the United States, the Italian Government awarded him the Order of S.S. Maurice and Lazarus. He was also made a Knight Commander of the Crown of Italy.

A Centurion who was his intimate friend and companion says of Henry Burchell: "He read everything and remembered much, adored people, laughter and good wine. We have lost in him one of the last Amateurs, using the term in the sense of one who knows a lot about lots of things, as opposed to the latter-day scholar who knows everything about something."

Charles Culp Burlingham

"C. C. B." was a Centurion in two senses. He was an honorary member of our Association. And, in years, he passed the century mark. To the end, in spite of physical handicaps, his mind was as vigorous and as luminous as in the days of his prime. The Century awarded him the highest honor it could give and the City of New York called him its First Citizen.

The arresting thing about his powerful influence upon the city's government was that it was exerted without title or office. His work for reform was all behind the scenes. To what extent his efforts determined the defeat of Tammany by the election of John Purroy Mitchel in 1913 and again, by the triumph of La Guardia in 1933, cannot be reckoned; nor can there be any accurate estimate of his immense influence on revisions of charter or the raising of judicial standards or the smashing of rackets, for he never sought personal credit. Yet there was no city official good or bad but felt either the guidance or the pressure of his hand; none was ever quite unaware of the intervention of his wit and wisdom.

Charles Culp Burlingham was born in Plainfield, New Jersey, the 31st of August, 1858. His father, Dr. Aaron Burlingham, was a Baptist minister who in the boy's ninth year was called to St. Louis. C. C. B. went for two years to Washington University there and then entered Harvard College, from which he was graduated in 1879. Two years later he received his LL.B. degree from the Columbia Law School in New York. In the same year, 1881, he was admitted to the New York bar and began law practice in the city.

A little known phase of his life began at this point. His father, in the old Baptist tradition, had so emphatically disapproved of the theater that the boy had grown up knowing nothing of it. On his father's death, however, the young man went suddenly into reverse from the parental training and conceived a passion for the stage. He was introduced to it by two friends: Julia Marlowe's first husband, Robert Mather, and an artist friend through whom he met Ellen Terry. In time he came to know the important actors and actresses in England and America, and after his election to the Century he brought the English producer Granville Barker to it for a long evening of talk about the international theater.

C. C. B.'s professional specialty became admiralty law, and he was long considered the leader in this field, although his interests ranged far and wide. Education was a particular concern. The overseers and faculty of Harvard felt his influence; three Harvard presidents knew of his devotion to the highest intellectual standards. For a while he headed New York City's Board of Education. Though he often expressed his contempt for "sentimental Christianity," he was deeply religious and took an intense interest in the vestry of St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church in New York of which he was senior warden. In politics he was a Democrat but not in city elections when Tammany held the party whip. In 1956 when he was ninety-eight, he told someone his major interests were Harvard University, his church, and the election of Adlai Stevenson.

C. C. B. was often on the unpopular side of a cause. He was a pioneer in the advocacy of woman suffrage. He believed in the innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti. He favored the admission of Red China to the United Nations. In a letter to the New York Times, he bitterly attacked the State Department for its denial of a visa to the so-called "red" Dean of Canterbury. The action was, he wrote, a "flagrant and foolish violation by our Government of the constitutional right of freedom of speech."

In the sixty-six years of his membership he became greatly attached to the Century. In his later years he was especially anxious to meet and talk to the younger members. In the spring of 1959, in his hundred and first year, he came to a dinner at the Century for Learned Hand. As a special honor he was seated between Judge Hand and Justice Frankfurter. But later in a taxi he was asked if this had pleased him. "It was all right," he replied, "but I would have preferred meeting some new people."

Once, when he was well over ninety, he wrote a note to a Centurion whom he did not know but whose name had puzzled him because it was so nearly like his own. "I am sure we must be cousins," he wrote. "Come and have tea with me and we'll talk about what bad spellers our ancestors were." The Centurion at once called him on the telephone. "No," he was told by the housekeeper, "Mr. Burlingham is downtown at his office. But I know he wants to see you. Can you come up at five today?" The Centurion arrived on time but C. C. B. had not come home. "Well," said the Centurion, "the traffic is bad—his car would naturally be delayed." "Car?" he was asked. "Why didn't you know, Mr. Burlingham always rides on the subway?" Presently he came. He was nearly blind and quite deaf. In an hour of talk his visitor was so fascinated that he lost all reckoning of time. Looking, at last, at his watch he was shocked. "But I have tired you!" he said. "Nonsense," said C. C. B., using his favorite expression, and he then insisted that the "cousin" stay another half hour.

Almost to the end of his life, he welcomed visitors. When he was at last confined by his disabilities, men and women came from everywhere to his home—not out of kindness to an old man but to be heartened by his courage and stimulated by his wise, humorous, and sometimes ironic words.

C. C. B. believed in an immortality beyond that of men's memories. The rector of his church remembers his saying: "Do you know the most interesting half hour I am looking forward to? It's the first half hour after death."

So we cannot mourn this friend; only rejoice that he stayed with us so long and gave us so much.

John Carroll

A Centurion who lives close to John Carroll's 300 acre farm in East Chatham, New York, tells of this talented, contradictory, sensitive, and lovable artist at home.

"John had a habit of sitting always in the same spot in his house, the corner of a sofa. Whatever woman guest arrived would naturally sit beside him at once for he had an irresistible charm for women. He might say to her, 'Would you like to see my collection of paper napkins?' And sure enough, under the cushion next to him, there they were, all the same of course. His humor was often zany and he never explained anything."

His powerful physique and colorful, almost flamboyant, dress hid a shy, gentle, and credulous man. This contradiction scared away some of those who would have liked his friendship but distrusted inconsistency. He is said to have been a lonely man because few could penetrate through his disguises to the fine reality beneath, but those who did become intimate with him were rewarded.

In his painting, too, there seemed to be paradox. Of his portraits an anonymous critic of the New York Times said: "They had a wispish, wraithlike quality—a kind of spindrift, diaphanous delicacy." One would not expect such painting to have the great strength that his fellow artists saw in his work. Actually he achieved wide recognition. In 1954 he was awarded the first prize in the Benjamin Altman competition at the National Academy of Design. The Metropolitan Museum of Art's purchase, also in 1954, of his painting "Spring Bonnet" followed the example of other museums in New York, Newark, Omaha, Andover, Toledo, and Honolulu.

John Carroll was born on a train of the Atcheson, Topeka and Santa Fé railroad in 1892. His parents were on their way to California, and John grew up there on his father's cattle ranch. It was there that he acquired his lifelong attachment to farming and the outdoor life. His talent for drawing showed itself when he was only five. As a boy he attended the Mark Hopkins Art Academy in San Francisco and later studied engineering at the University of California. He was in the navy in the First World War. In 1922 he had his first show in New York and two years later won the Purchase Prize from the University of Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. This enabled him to go abroad and establish a studio in Paris. On his return in 1926 he was appointed professor of painting at the Art Students League in New York.

His farm in Columbia County, New York, was a real farm and he did much of the heavy work himself, for which he was greatly respected by the farmers of the countryside. Here too, he trained hunters and for many years was Master of the Carroll Hounds.

Except for his admirers among his fellow artists, he did not have a chance to know many Centurions. He died after he had been a member only four years.

Harris Dunscomb Colt

Harris Colt nearly reached the century mark. At ninety-eight he was Yale's oldest living graduate and had been a New York lawyer for more than seventy years. A year before his death he was still practicing. He had outlived nearly all of his Centurion friends.

Colt's ancestors had been in America since the landing of the Mayflower. His grandfather, Elisha Colt, had fought in the Revolution as a member of the Eighth Company of the Eighth Regiment of the Connecticut Continental line. Harris Colt carried on the military tradition by joining the original Troop A—the nucleus of New York's Squadron A—and he was before his death its only surviving member.

He graduated from Yale at the age of twenty-three in 1884. After receiving his law degree at the Columbia Law School, he worked with Lord, Day and Lord until, in 1896, he became a member of the firm of Stearns, Curtis and Colt, later Curtis, Mallet-Prevost, Colt and Mosle. He was an estate and trust specialist.

He was at one time a vice-president and trustee of the Sevilla Home for Children in New York and a trustee of New York's Society for the Relief of Half Orphans and Destitute Children.

In point of membership Colt had seniority in the Downtown Association (of which he was Honorary Member), the University Club of New York, and the Yale Club.

He was a Centurion for forty-five years. He used to come often to the Long Table for lunch but in later years gave it up on account of deafness.

Charles Pelham Curtis

In the Apocrypha, II Esdras, 14:25, it is written: "I shall light a candle of understanding in thine heart, which shall not be put out, till the things be performed which thou shalt begin to write." Charlie Curtis put this quotation at the head of the first commentary in his A Commonplace Book.

"I like 'a candle of understanding,' " he wrote. "Not a flash, not a searchlight, nor a floodlight. A small flame burning in a great room, flickering and swaying in the drafts, darkening the far corners, casting long shadows behind the high backed chairs, the deeper behind what it most illuminates. A warm light, lending grace and beauty to what it is making visible, and giving a presence to what it leaves obscure."

There is deep thought behind the words in this paragraph; it must be reread a good many times to find it all. But, too, it gives an image of Charlie's mind—a "great room" illumined by "a warm light." Those who knew him well knew how great and how warm.

A Commonplace Book is full of wisdom. But it is shot through with humor, too, and it reflects a panorama of reading and study far beyond the scope of most busy lawyers. It gives new interpretations to the writings of Montaigne, of Pascal, of Pindar, of Voltaire, even of Shakespeare. Occasionally it takes King James's translators to task for their misunderstandings of Hebrew nuances. You will find A Commonplace Book in the Century library, and sampling it will give you an afternoon of surprise and delight.

Charles Pelham Curtis was a native of Boston. He was educated at Groton, at the École des Sciences Politique in Paris, and at Harvard. He received an A.B. degree from Harvard College in 1914 and an LL.B. from Harvard Law School in 1917. After two years in the navy in the First World War, he was admitted to the Massachusetts bar. In addition to an active practice, he was assistant United States attorney in Massachusetts, a member of the Harvard Corporation, a member of the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, trustee of several banks and of Sarah Lawrence College, and a lecturer in government and sociology at Harvard. With all these things, he found time to hunt big game in Africa and to write several books.

At the Century, we looked forward to Charlie's visits. Each time there was something in his conversation that carried over to the next time. His spirit was here; Charlie always seemed to be just around the corner so that we did not think of him as a non-resident.

One of his last acts was to write, for the Groton School Quarterly, a memorial to our beloved historian George Martin which was at once so sympathetic and so witty that George himself—had he been more aware of his own importance—might have done it. It brought George so immediately alive that to his friends who read it the memorial gave a measure of compensation for his loss.

Charlie's life ended in sudden tragedy. He died of burns suffered in a flash fire in his home in Stonington. For a man's friends such a thing is hard to take until we remember that he died at the peak of life, knowing neither weakness of body nor dimming of mind.

George Parmly Day

George was one of the redhead boys in his brother Clarence's play, Life With Father, and his friends say that he inherited some of the traits of the immortal Clarence, Senior. "He had," one Centurion friend reports, "immense energy, got a tremendous amount done, was utterly charming when he was in the right mood but had a short and explosive temper like Father Day." That he was greatly loved outside, as well as within the Century, is shown by the outpouring of sorrow and tribute that followed his death.

His life was devoted to Yale and through Yale to literature. As president of the Yale University Press, he arranged for the publication of some 2,000 books. The Century has a special interest in this part of his career, for he established here a memorial to his Centurion brother, Clarence, in the form of books bearing a Clarence Day bookplate. Each year he would send a list of books published by the Yale Press from which the Committee on Literature was asked to select those it wished to add to the Clarence Day collection.

George Day was born in New York in 1876. His grandfather was Benjamin Day, founder of the New York Sun. His father was governor of the New York Stock Exchange. George went to St. Paul's School and entered Yale with the class of 1897. As an undergraduate he was editor of the Record, managing editor of the News and a member of Psi Upsilon and Scroll and Key. On his graduation he worked for a time in his father's Wall Street firm, but after ten years, in which he became a senior partner, his beloved Yale drew him back to New Haven. In 1908 he established the Yale University Press, and in 1910 he was elected Yale's treasurer, succeeding Lee McClung who had just been appointed Treasurer of the United States. His attitude toward his dual responsibility is reflected in his answer to an alumni questionnaire in which he gave Yale University Treasurer as his occupation and listed the Yale University Press under "hobbies and recreations."

Under Day's guidance Yale's endowment fund rose from $12,000,000 in 1910 to $101,000,000 in 1942. In 1944 he retired from the post and from the Press, but he never retired from Yale. He kept an office on the campus, watched all of the University's affairs with close interest, and, as an editorial in the New York Times put it, "to the passing students he seemed as permanent a campus figure as old Ben Silliman's statue."

Though he always spoke of his brother Clarence as the only literary member of the family, George's own effervescent wit kept bursting forth in verse. He loved to poke fun at Harvard. When it was announced that Harvard had received as a gift the ownership of the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in New York, he wrote in a stanza of a longer poem:

*Shall it [Harvard] base the pay of teachers
On the bar sales at the Ritz?
Do with fewer chapel preachers
If there's less demand for Schlitz?*

In 1939 King Gustav V of Sweden made him a Knight of the Royal Order of the North Star in recognition of a book, Sweden, the Middle Way, by Marginschilds, published by the Yale Press. He was awarded honorary degrees by Princeton, Colgate, and Lake Erie College as well as by Yale.

Elected in 1930, he grew fond of the Century, the meeting place of so many colleagues.

Eugene Floyd Dubois

Along with the progress of aviation and submarine activity and with the spread of world war, more and more dark corners of the earth have been revealed as places where man could, and sometimes must, live. The unique capacity of the human animal to create his own environment has led many men into the fascinating study of the supposed uninhabitable.

One of these explorers in the field of physiology was Doctor Gene Dubois. What the human body could endure in extremes of heat and cold, starvation and thirst, altitude and ocean depth became his special interest and the subject of constant experiment not only in laboratory and hospital but in arctic exploration and two world wars as well.

Eugene Dubois was educated at Harvard College and Columbia's College of Physicians and Surgeons. After his internship at Presbyterian Hospital in New York he specialized in pathology. In the First World War, he served in the navy medical corps and was assigned to a submarine. Here came his first opportunity to study physiological reactions under uncommon pressures. For his work he was awarded the Navy Cross.

In 1928 he began to work closely with Centurion Vilhjalmur Stefansson on dietary experiments. He was at that time director of the Russell Sage Institute of Pathology. Stefansson himself was the subject of some of these tests in which, among other things, it was found that a man could live for several weeks on meat and water alone without suffering any damage. Doctor Dubois also aroused much interest and discussion in the medical profession by his studies of the effects of heat and cold. As a result of these he held that although the body adapted easily to extremes of heat, it was ill-fitted to withstand severe cold. When Doctor Stefansson published his book Not By Bread Alone, Dubois wrote the Introduction.

A Centurion who was his close associate and friend writes that Eugene Dubois was "a many-sided man, a really great scientist, a good teacher and leader, a cultured man with unusual charm, a tremendous worker. His work for the army and navy in the matter of physiology of the human in high flying and in submarines was extremely valuable to our country. He was widely known for his investigations of metabolism and established the first real scientific foundation for standards of basal metabolism, so helpful to the technician in diagnosing toxic goiter. With all his learning and wide knowledge he was most modest and approachable to the students and fellow workers under his guidance, provided he was convinced of their sincerity and real desire to learn."

In the Second World War, Dubois attained the rank of captain in the navy. At his death he was professor emeritus of the Cornell Medical Center.

He was a Centurion for just under forty years.

John Foster Dulles

There is always controversy about the way a Secretary conducts the Department of State. None of the Centurions who have occupied this highest position in the cabinet of the United States has escaped criticism. But in such controversy lies the health of the republic.

In the office of Secretary of State Foster Dulles was preceded by a Centurion, and he is followed by one. In their years when international alliances and hostilities have altered almost overnight, when the "containment" of communism has presented new difficulties year after year, and when the problem of coexistence with the Soviet Union has harassed every thinking American, the job of these men has moved beyond our accurate appraisal. Fortunately Centurions have other criteria for the judgment of their fellow members and it is in the light of these that we must remember Foster Dulles.

One of our members who knew him well contributes a word which reveals him in this light.

"I was regularly struck," he writes, "by his courage and have no doubt myself that his courage was rooted in faith and what our Quaker friends call 'concern.' The above remark is not intended to gloss over his occasional lapses into politicians' expediency nor to brush under the rug lapses of tact and consideration which made his task more difficult. But at the center of the labyrinth of his character was, in my judgment, deep concern for the difference between right and wrong, a mixture of Presbyterian Elder and Old Testament Prophet, which helps to explain a good deal of his zeal, singleness of purpose, and almost unbearable sense that he was engaged in a crusade against the forces of evil. One might in all fairness be able to criticize a Secretary of State for pressing some of these matters too far under given circumstances, but I do think that any implication of hypocrisy or insincerity would be both unfair and inaccurate."

There are those who think that such old-fashioned compulsions are out of place in a man who must conjure with balances of power. Perhaps one with colder heart and a mind restrained by austere objectivity would be more successful in dealing with forces which may have gone beyond human control. Yet in this time of fading morals and dissolving integrity it is heartening to see a man who has preserved standards out of a nearly forgotten past, who has faith in some absolute ideal that is immune to dialectic or logic.

Whether or not we can share that faith it is beyond doubt that it supported him in the extremes of his last suffering. Perhaps most of all this quiet endurance woke our admiration.

Foster Dulles was born in Washington in 1888. His father, the Reverend Allen M. Dulles, was a liberal Presbyterian minister. Along with the religious influence exerted by his father a distinguished maternal grandfather gave him political background. This John Foster, following the classic American tradition, went from the frontier cabin in which he was born to generalship in the Civil War and the cabinet of President Benjamin Harrison in which he was Secretary of State.

Foster was graduated from Princeton in 1908, Phi Beta Kappa, valedictorian of his class, and winner of a scholarship entitling him to a year's study at the Sorbonne in Paris. This study persuaded him to take up law rather than theology. In George Washington University, where he pursued this aim, he got the highest grades ever attained at the University. He was then admitted to the New York bar and began work with the firm of Sullivan and Cromwell. In the next years he moved further and further into the international field.

Unfit, because of poor eyesight, for combat service in the First World War, he was commissioned captain in the War Industries Board. At the war's end he was sent to the Versailles Peace Conference, where he was one of five economic advisers to President Wilson. He was then but thirty-one years old.

From this point, as a partner in the firm in which he had started, Foster worked on a series of international assignments. Just before the Second World War he became a close associate of Thomas Dewey. This did not prevent him from accepting an appointment from President Truman (who had just defeated Dewey for the Presidency) as chairman of the United States delegation to the United Nations at Paris just after the election of 1948.

It is generally conceded that had Dewey been elected in 1948 he would have appointed Dulles his Secretary of State. Until 1952, however, Dulles's work was bipartisan. In 1951 President Truman sent him to Tokyo on an extremely delicate mission consequent upon the removal of General MacArthur from his Far East Command. In 1952, however, in the Eisenhower campaign Dulles was angrily Republican.

When he became the new President's Secretary of State, he broke the long diplomatic tradition of leaving to United States envoys abroad the handling of international crises. In these events he insisted in being personally on the spot. The result was that he was almost perpetually in flight: even at the start of his illness when he must have been in pain he refused to share responsibility with the diplomats in foreign lands.

Foster Dulles's relatively brief membership in the Century coincided for the most part with this peripatetic activity. For this reason, he seldom got to the Club—a circumstance his many friends there regretted, as he was a charming as well as an instructive companion.

Harrison Griswold Dwight

In a long, active, and useful career, Harrison Dwight has been a diplomat, an author, a poet, a news correspondent, and a museum director. Much of his writing was done against the background of his early career in the Near East; for example, there was his poem which became the subject of the opera In a Pasha's Garden, produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

Dwight's parents were Congregational missionaries in Turkey, and he was born in Constantinople. After attending the preparatory school for Roberts College, he came to the United States and took his bachelor's degree from Amherst in 1898. He began his career as vice-consul in Venice and also served as correspondent for the Chicago News Herald.

In the First World War he was secretary to General Tasker Bliss, and he continued in that position during the negotiations of the Versailles Peace Treaty. For some ten years after 1919 he was with the Near East and Protocol Divisions of the Department of State. When he left, he expected to devote himself entirely to writing. He had already published several short stories which were collected in two volumes: Stamboul Nights and The Emperor of Elam. Later he wrote regularly for the magazines: articles, book reviews, and poems.

In 1936 he became assistant director of the Frick Collection on Seventy-second Street in New York and was there for ten years. At his death he was eighty-three. He had been a Centurion for twenty-one years.

Lewis Battelle Franklin

A banker by profession, Lewis Franklin was best known and will be remembered mainly for his important work in the Protestant Episcopal Church. He began his career in finance at sixteen when he was a bank messenger in New York. Some fifteen years later he was vice-president of the Guaranty Trust Company. During the First World War he became president of the Investment Bankers Association of America. Then in 1918 he was called to Washington to assist Secretary of the Treasury William G. McAdoo with war loans and Liberty and Victory Bond drives.

After the war's end he became interested in the church. It was Bishop Lloyd who diverted him from banking. The bishop was then president of the Episcopal Board of Missions. The church, he said, needed someone with Franklin's business acumen, skill in honest diplomacy and enthusiasm to manage the "reawakening campaign" of 1919. Franklin did this as a volunteer; then, at the beginning of 1920 he accepted the position of treasurer of the National Council, a post in which he remained until his retirement in 1948.

He moved, then, from New York to Noroton, Connecticut, and devoted much of his time to helping the local Episcopal church there. But he was interested, too, in the whole of the Connecticut diocese and led a campaign for church building throughout the state.

Although his mind was quick and sharp and his intelligence high, these qualities never made him aggressive or egotistic. On the contrary, he was self-effacing, giving the credit for many of his noteworthy accomplishments to others. He was naturally generous and innately kind.

He enjoyed games. He was a steady tennis player and a formidable opponent at bridge. He was witty and talented in amateur theatricals. At the Club he could often be found in the pool room, where he held his own with the best of them.

Lewis Franklin lived for eighty years. Every institution he helped was better for his touch and so were many boys and men.

James Lawder Gamble

A sailor, a golfer, a photographer, incurably addicted to the State of Maine, James Gamble was celebrated in the medical profession for what he termed "the study of disease by the methods of chemistry." To this, early in his career, he decided to devote his life. That he could carry on such an intensely absorbing research without losing any of his enjoyment in his amateur activities was a revelation to ivory tower students.

Dr. Gamble was educated at Leland Stanford College and the Harvard Medical School. He received his M.D. degree in 1910 and five years later joined the Department of Pediatrics at Johns Hopkins. It was there that he conducted what the Harvard Medical Alumni Bulletin calls "his classic investigations on the maintenance of acid-base equilibrium and body fluid volume in fasting children."

To the layman the idea of "fasting children" is not appealing, and the thought that the poor youngsters might be starved in order to carry on medical experiment is horrifying indeed. But it would have been equally so to Jim Gamble. Actually he took quick advantage of a new therapy for the treatment of young epileptics. It was found that by prolonged fasting of these child patients, seizures could be inhibited.

This presented an ideal condition for the measurement of electrolytic intake and loss. The results of the tests became the basis for many important papers and lectures which, for practicing pediatricians everywhere, clarified biochemical thinking. It is said that, largely due to Gamble's work, infant mortality caused by diarrheal dehydration was nearly eliminated. To this doctor who, during his internship at Boston's Floating Hospital had watched babies die like flies of summer diarrhea, these discoveries must have brought immense satisfaction.

In 1922 he was invited by Harvard to set up the chemistry laboratory at the Children's Hospital in Boston. After some seven years of teaching at the Harvard Medical School he was made full professor of pediatrics, a post he held until 1950 when he became professor emeritus.

In his lectures he was careful to avoid what he called "precise misinformation"—more wrong because it was so precise. For this reason he did not speak extemporaneously but memorized his carefully studied and polished lectures. These were characterized, the Harvard Medical Alumni Bulletin says, by "a classic economy and precision of style, wealth of content, deliberateness and quiet humor." The Bulletin tells a story to illustrate this:

A lecture came so soon after the final exams in pathology that his audience was "in a mentally relaxed condition. Just prior to Dr. Gamble's entry, students filled his water glass with a rather strong mixture of gin and water. When the moment came and he lifted the glass to his lips, there was no obvious reaction. As sip followed sip, the intricate interlocking concepts of electrolytic physiology unfolded clearly, deliberately, beautifully. After he downed the last drop at the end of the lecture, still without visible effect, he offered a toast to 'water'—to a class which by this time had assimilated very little of the meticulously prepared and studiously memorized lecture."

Gamble owned Calf Island off Sorrento in Frenchman's Bay, Maine. Here he took his vacations sailing in the "'Torno" (a yacht named for the Italian song, "Ritorno a Sorrento") or working over his photographs in his summer workshop there. But he indulged his hobbies not only on vacations. His colleagues remember that on the way to medical meetings he would stop off for a day of golf and an evening of fun with the other doctors.

After he died, there was a memorial service for him on his beloved island. Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen, president of the Union Theological Seminary, spoke of James Gamble's "instinctive courtesy to those of every station—adult and child, rich and poor, learned and untutored, eminent and unknown—kindliness without patronage, and a concern without condescension."

Jerome Davis Greene

Probably no one in his generation has done more for Harvard than Jerome Greene. After working his way through Harvard College and the Harvard Law School by newspaper work and tutoring jobs in the summer, his sense of loyalty and gratitude to the University lasted through his long life. In his later years his brilliant work for Harvard compensated him for the personal disaster he encountered in his business career.

He was born in Yokohama in 1874, the son of American Congregational missionaries, and his first dozen years were spent in Japan. When he was thirteen, he came to the United States and prepared for Harvard, which he entered with the class of 1896. After he was graduated, he spent two years in the law school. Like many men who have had legal education, he never practiced law; yet he gave abundant proof of the contention—much alive in these days—that this study is of great value in any profession as well as in the higher reaches of business.

From the turn of the century Jerome had a varied career. But Harvard was always an anchor, and he never drifted far from her support. He was secretary to President Charles W. Eliot from 1901 to 1905, when he became secretary to the Harvard Corporation. Five years later, he came to New York as the first business manager of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and in 1913 he became the first executive officer of the Rockefeller Foundation. He resigned in 1917 to accept a partnership in the Boston firm of Lee, Higginson and Company. During the First World War he was in London as executive secretary of the American Shipping Mission, and in 1919 he was the American member of the Secretariat of the Reparations Committee at the Versailles Peace Conference.

In the depression the investment banking firm to which he had given fifteen years of effort became a total casualty, and Jerome suffered overwhelming personal financial losses. The next two years after this disaster in 1932 he spent as a professor of international politics at the University College of Wales. This seemed to his host of friends in America a kind of retirement, and he was greatly missed.

But Harvard simply could not get along without Jerome Greene. He had become so integral a part of it that Cambridge just didn't look right without him. And Harvard at this time was planning its greatest celebration since it had been, for the settlers of Massachusetts Bay in 1636 the "first flower of their wilderness, star of their night." Who, then, was the logical designer and administrator of this Tercentary but Jerome Davis Greene?

The beauty and dignity of that festival will be long remembered not only by Harvard men but by educators everywhere. For Jerome Greene it was a triumphant return to the field of his earlier success. He again became secretary of the Harvard Corporation and there, under the presidency of Centurion James Bryant Conant, he remained until his retirement in 1943.

Since then he was a familiar figure at the Century. Though his home was in Cambridge, he came to the Club whenever he was in New York. His friends among us were many indeed, and he was greatly beloved.

Ferris Greenslet

It is not usual for a man to be successful as editor and author at the same time—although many try. Writers commonly use an editorial position as a stepping stone to authorship, but then their eagerness to write persuades them to steal time away from editing. Sometimes, too, they become frustrated by being forced to deal with the creations of others instead of focusing on their own masterpieces.

Ferris Greenslet was an exception to the rule. While he was associate editor of the Atlantic Monthly, he produced biographies of James Russell Lowell and Walter Pater and The Quest of the Holy Grail. Then, during a long, distinguished career with Houghton, Mifflin and Company, he wrote a life of Thomas Bailey Aldrich and an autobiography entitled Under the Bridge. The Practical Cogitator, on which he collaborated with Centurion Charles Curtis, set the pattern for Curtis's later A Commonplace Book. During this time he moved from literary adviser of the publishing house to director, general manager of the trade department, and vice-president.

Greenslet was born in Glens Falls, New York, in 1875. He took his bachelor's and master's degree at Wesleyan University in 1898, his Ph.D. at Columbia in 1900, and his Doctorate of Letters at Dartmouth in 1924. Meanwhile he was with the Atlantic from 1902 to 1907 and then began his career in book publishing. He was a member of Phi Beta Kappa, of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, and the Massachusetts Historical Society. Greenslet's autobiography, Under the Bridge, reveals a habit of mind that many of us take tranquilizers to attain. For he is unafraid of digression, unashamed of leisurely thought. In the Preface to The Practical Cogitator, he and his collaborator, Charles Curtis, carried on a brief dialogue in verse that suggests a happy environment for thinking:

*Ferris, this fumbling through other minds
Has made me thirsty. Tell me where one finds
A place where you and I can sit,
And slake the dust of other people's wit.*

To which, Ferris replies:

*Charles, I know a tavern not far distant
Where we can sit and talk o'er wine consistent*

*With our own thoughts; and while we're drinking
We will atone for all vicarious thinking.*

He was a Centurion for fifty of his eighty-four years.

Lloyd Carpenter Griscom

Meeting with the chief of a fierce nomad tribe in an almost unexplored part of Persia, employing a United States battleship to bluff the Sultan of Turkey into paying a $90,000 debt, conducting the relief operations after the Messina earthquake in Italy, flying with Wilbur Wright in 1909 when the top altitude was 200 feet, serving as aide-de-camp to a general in the Spanish-American War and as a liaison officer on Pershing's staff in the First World War—these were only a few of Lloyd Griscom's exploits in a life of eighty-six years. He was at various times lawyer, diplomat, soldier, sportsman, author, and newspaper publisher.

Born in Riverton, New Jersey, in 1872, Griscom spent his schoolboy years in Pennsylvania, Switzerland, and France. He took his Bachelor of Philosophy degree in 1891, at the head of his class, in the Wharton School of Finance and Economics of the University of Pennsylvania. He then studied law at the Pennsylvania Law School, and at twenty-one he held the post of attaché to the London Embassy and was also the private secretary to the American Ambassador to the Court of St. James's. In 1895 he returned to the United States and attended the law school of New York University. His studies were interrupted by the Spanish-American War in which he was captain of volunteers.

His diplomatic career began in earnest with his service as chargé d'affaires in Constantinople from 1899 to 1901. It was there, when he was only twenty-eight that he had his brush with the Sultan. The debt owed by the Turkish government had resulted from damage to United States property during the recent Armenian massacre. On learning that the battleship Kentucky was scheduled to stop at Smyrna, he requested Secretary of State John Hay to order it to remain there five days. This scared the Sultan into offering to pay in full, but Griscom magnanimously agreed to an installment plan. Richard Harding Davis, Griscom's close friend, wrote him, "Few boys of 28 are given a battleship to play with. Be careful it doesn't go off." A few years before this incident Davis and Griscom had made extensive travels together as a result of which Griscom became one of the heroes of Davis's book Three Gringos in Central America.

At thirty-four he became our youngest ambassador. This was to Italy. He had already served as minister to Persia, to Brazil, and to Japan. He was in Japan during the whole of the Russo-Japanese war. After he left the diplomatic service, he practiced law in New York until the First World War, when he went overseas with the 77th division and became a staff officer with the rank of lieutenant colonel.

All these experiences had given him the sense of news values that is needed to own and operate a paper. The journal he chose was the Tallahassee Democrat and he resolved to give Tallahassee "a better newspaper than a town this size can normally afford." From this time in the late twenties, he remained with the Democrat and lived in Georgia until his death there.

Griscom was always a sports enthusiast. He played tennis till he was over seventy, and his golf continued to his middle eighties. He was an excellent shot and was out shooting pheasants three days before he died.

With his varied interests so far away and so exigent he was able in his nearly fifty years of membership to make only occasional visits to the Century. But we were proud of him and happy to greet him when he could find time to come.

Ludlow Griscom

In an article in the Audubon magazine by the President of the National Audubon Society, Centurion John Baker, a story is told which shows that Ludlow Griscom was expert in botany as well as in ornithology.

"One day Ludlow and Dr. Robert Cushman Murphy were traveling east toward Montauk, Long Island, at some 50 miles an hour. Murphy suddenly said, 'Ludlow, what is that white flower we just went by in the shoulder of the road?' Ludlow, without stopping the car, still going at 50 miles an hour, looked through the back window and said, 'That is (such and such) indigenous to Switzerland and that is the first record of it in this country.' He stopped the car within a quarter-mile, backed up, and verified the observation."

Ludlow Griscom's interest which brought him into the first rank of contemporary ornithologists began at the age of six. In the tender years that followed, to the annoyance of his parents, he "wasted" countless hours out in the fields with binoculars, watching and studying.

Until he was eleven, he was taught at home by private tutors who enhanced routine instruction by making him fluent in French and German and an accomplished piano player. From eleven to fifteen he went to school in New York and at fifteen passed the entrance examination to Harvard. Too young to enter college, he spent the next two years traveling with his parents in Europe and perfecting his languages and music. He then turned from Harvard to Columbia, from which he was graduated in 1912. His father wanted him to go to law school, but Ludlow insisted on following his passionate interest at Cornell. He was Cornell's first graduate student in ornithology. After taking his master's degree there, he worked for ten years in the bird department of the American Museum of Natural History. In 1927 he accepted a life appointment as research ornithologist in Harvard's Museum of Comparative Zoology.

As a lieutenant with the American Expeditionary Force in 1918, Griscom served in a unit that sent leaflets in balloons over the German lines. In the Second World War he organized some thirty linguists to translate articles from foreign language newspapers and periodicals. During the war he used his bird knowledge to tell an anxious father from what mysterious front his son had written. The young man had explained that he could not divulge his whereabouts but that he had just seen a manatee in captivity and thought this would interest Ludlow Griscom. The father showed Ludlow the letter; without hesitation the ornithologist said the son had been on a boat off the coast of British Guiana, that he had landed there and had written, no doubt, from Georgetown. This uncanny bit of detective work was later verified in detail.

In the course of his constantly active life, Ludlow Griscom was President of the Boston Society of Natural History and chairman of the board of directors of the National Audubon Society. His field trips in the interests of both botany and ornithology took him to Labrador, Newfoundland, Mexico, Panama, Cape Town, Dakar, and Rabat. He was awarded the Conservation Medal of the National Audubon Society.

To those who knew him well, Ludlow Griscom endeared himself by his sense of humor, his warmth, and his capacity for true affection.

George Matthews Harding

"Although, at moment," says a fellow artist, "the work of such contemporaries as George Harding has been overlooked in the pursuit of the abstract, I am sure that the day is coming when his work will be regarded in the same light as that of Frederic Remington and Winslow Homer." It seems unlikely, however, that even in a forest of abstract art Harding's work can ever be hidden, for it has been integrated with architecture in permanent monuments to his skill. For he was, primarily, a muralist; he has recorded in form and color adapted to many structural settings some of the events which have given direction to our history. That he worked from drawings made on the spot in these critical times and places is a circumstance that has given his production an uncommon authenticity.

In two World Wars Harding followed troops into combat. From 1917 to 1919, as captain of engineers, he served as official combat artist with the American Expeditionary Force in France. A quarter century later, as a major in the United States Marine Corps, he painted a record of the invasions in the South Sea islands. In the meantime he did many paintings which, today, are in collections of the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts and the Sacramento

Museum in California, in the Chrysler collection in Detroit, and in the hands of many private owners. Also, between the wars, he was on the faculty of the School of the Pennsylvania Academy. He was a popular teacher, favored for his directness, his sincerity, his scorn of the preciousness which was often present in the art circles of the day, and what one of his students has called a "down-to-earth brusqueness."

George Harding was born in Philadelphia in 1882. He was educated at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, where he studied architecture as well as painting. For two years he was a pupil of the illustrator Howard Pyle. In 1908 he was sent by Harper's magazine to the northern ice fields and to the West Indies as illustrator and four years later journeyed 'round the world as special artist for Harper's. He took up mural painting in 1916.

His principal murals are in the Philadelphia Custom House, the United States Post Office Administration in Washington, the Municipal Courthouse in Philadelphia, the Montgomery County Courthouse in Norristown, Pennsylvania, and the J. J. Audubon Shrine in Mill Grove, Pennsylvania. He was awarded the Pennsylvania Academy's Stotesbury Award and its Gold Medal of Honor, the Gold Medal of the Architectural League of New York, and the Fine Arts Award of the Philadelphia Chapter of the American Institute of Architecture.

Unfortunately his non-resident membership in the Century was terminated by his death after only five years, so that few of us who had not known him before were able to become his friends. But among our artists and architects he had a host of admirers.

Walter Hauser

Of the many Centurions who have been connected with the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Walter Hauser was one of the best loved. Like Hebe Winlock and Ambrose Lansing, he was an archaeologist. The "digs" in which he took part were not only in Egypt but in Iraq and Persia as well. He was successful in his work and had the rare gift of telling others about it with simple clarity, as many a young man about to embark on this fascinating but complex profession remembers. Indeed, much of his energy was devoted to this encouragement and inspiration of his less experienced colleagues—especially in his later life when as curator of the Museum's library his interests reached out to cover many kinds of art.

Hauser was born in Middlefield, Massachusetts, in 1893. He studied architecture at M.I.T. and afterward taught advanced mathematics and drawing. But he was restless in this work, which seemed to him formulated and repetitive, and the Metropolitan's suggestion that he work on an Egyptian expedition easily lured him away. This was concerned with the necropolis of Thebes, and his survey of that area was thought by his associates to have been a "veritable masterpiece of draftsmanship and clear exposition."

When he was not digging, he got immense pleasure from the opera and the theater. He had learned to enjoy them in Boston while he was studying there, and they filled much of his spare time during the New York intervals between his far-flung activities.

In 1931 he accompanied a joint expedition of the Metropolitan and German State Museums which excavated the site of Ctesiphon, near Baghdad, and the following year he was appointed adviser to the Persian expedition to Kasi-i-Abu-Nasr, the site of the Shiraz of the Susanian and early Mohammedan eras—near the present Shiraz. Later he helped organize the Museum's own Persian expedition, an operation continued till 1940 when the war stopped it. In 1946 he was made curator of the library, and he showed an administrative ability that ordered and eased the work of his assistants.

Hauser never cared for official formality. His way was direct and simple; if he could by-pass protocol so much the better. He was uncommonly generous, and though most of his giving was anonymous, his liberal contributions to the Welfare Fund of the Museum's Employees Association will be long remembered.

A favorite avocation was cooking. The lucky friends who got invited to his repasts used to say he could have been a first-rate professional chef if he had not had so many other interests.

Walter Hauser's Centurion friends are sorry he came so late to the Century and that his membership was cut off so soon after his election.

Allan Vanderhoef Heely

The particular kind of genius it takes to be a successful headmaster of a boys' school is rare and inscrutable. It is not enough to say that such a man must be patient, tolerant, firm, and wise. It is not enough for him to understand the adolescent; he must know and judge the adult as well. Only part of his problem involves boys; a large and extremely difficult part concerns his subordinate teachers and their wives and families—in the community but not of it.

Patience, tolerance, and the quick memory of when he was himself a boy, painfully harassed by the business of growing—these are part of it sure enough. But what distinguishes the natural from the synthetic school head is flexibility. The capacity for quick adjustment to a sequence of problems, each of which in some phase is unique, lifts a man out of formula and makes him great in his field.

Allan Heely is remembered by his teachers as such a person. "As a headmaster," one of them has written, "Allan always put common sense ahead of arbitrary rules and was annoyed when members of his faculty regarded rules as if they were tablets from Sinai, forgetting that it was only we, after all, who had made them up." Another of his uncommon gifts was the ability to delegate authority. He would give someone a job to do and was so intuitively certain he had picked the right man that he could forget it. Once he had set an assignment he never interfered. A reason this worked so well at Lawrenceville was his unerring judgment of men. He picked a teacher only when all doubts had vanished.

Allan Heely was born in Brooklyn in 1897. His preparatory school was Andover, his college Yale. His college career was interrupted by the First World War, in which he served as second lieutenant of field artillery at Camp Jackson.

After graduating with the class of 1919, he began a business career, first in advertising and then in wholesale dry-goods. But he soon found out that business was wrong for him. "I wanted," he wrote in a class report, "to do something that I could get excited about. After two years of consideration, education seemed to fill the bill. Its importance was basic, its interest promising. I got a job as teacher of English at Andover, my place in business was taken by a green typist, and it looked as though the world was safe again." While still at Andover, he took an M.A. degree at Oxford. In 1934, however safe the world had looked seen from Andover, he left it to head Lawrenceville.

This school, more than a century old, had had its ups and downs. It was having a relative down when Allan Heely took charge. In twenty-five years he brought the endowment fund from almost nothing into the millions. Notwithstanding the considerable enrollment of 625 boys, he introduced the Harkness conference plan in which all classes of instruction were limited to fourteen boys.

Allan is remembered by those who worked with him as "affable, conciliatory, deliberate and discreet"—the opposite of his predecessor. He described his recreation as "a careful cultivation of complete inertia from which I emerge occasionally to play a game of golf." But he also played the piano and sang; he was gregarious and genial. He wrote one book, Why the Private School? whose title explains it.

A Centurion friend tells: "Allan was a discerning gourmet and an ideal companion for an evening at the Century. Delighting always in the exact use of words, he was able to make any topic seem amusing and significant. The secret of this was partly that to an exceptional degree his was the magic gift of perceiving in all things the difference between the apparent and the real."

Allan Heely died at the untimely age of sixty-two. He had been a member of the Century twenty-five years.

Charles Ralph Hickox

"Charlie Hickox," writes a close friend, "was a figure out of the Victorian era—tall and straight, with a fine intellectual face. He always wore a high, stiff collar, a bow tie and a double-breasted suit and made an arresting picture. In politics, he was a conservative of the conservatives. A little to the right of Louis XIV, it has been said."

Hickox was educated at both Yale and Harvard; he got his bachelor's degree at Yale in 1893; the Harvard Law School gave him his LL.B. three years later. He began practice with Convers and Kirlin (which later became Kirlin, Campbell and Keating) in 1899 and was a partner in the firm in 1908. He was a highly successful admiralty lawyer.

Many psychologists believe that the habit of intense concentration builds a good memory. Hickox had both to an uncommon degree. A young lawyer who worked for him used to be astonished by the documentation of his mind. Hickox would lean back in his chair and dictate a long brief without once looking up a citation. Such a performance is, of course, a superb time-saver, but other lawyers should be pretty sure they have his truly photographic memory before they follow his example.

He carried this quality outside the office. He was fond of reading; especially fond of poetry. He could recite his favorite poems in toto without a slip. He had a sensitive literary taste and could display it with sharp wit.

During the First World War, in which he was a major with the American Expeditionary Force, he gave valuable service as judge advocate. He was decorated by the French government with the Order of University Palms. But he was then already a veteran of the Spanish American War, having served in Cuba with New York's Squadron A.

Charlie Hickox was a charming companion, and we were lucky to have him with us so long. He was a member for forty-six years.

James Hazen Hyde

"Caleb" Hyde, as his intimates used to call him, saw little of his American friends during his middle years, unless they happened to be in Paris. Yet during his self-imposed exile, he won his most important distinctions. The Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor was awarded him for his long devotion to Franco-American cultural relations. He was chairman of The Federation of French Alliances in the United States, he founded The Alliance Française in America, and had the rare honor of election as associate member of The French Academy of Moral and Political Sciences.

"Caleb's" early life before he left for France under a stigma which he always considered unjust was colorful indeed. He was born in Manhattan in 1876, the son of Henry Baldwin Hyde, founder of The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States. At the age of twenty-two he was graduated from Harvard College with honors in French and German.

On his father's death a year later, the young man inherited a large fortune. He then began a life of what Thorstein Veblen called "conspicuous leisure." Its evidences were not mere luxury—although the luxury may have been the most conspicuous part of it—but it involved, too, finesse of judgment in the acquisition of beautiful things in which he delighted. But he took pleasure as well in the refinements of cuisine and service; his dinners and other entertainments became the talk of the town. As usual the reports of these affairs emphasized their lavishness in terms of their apparent cost rather than of Hyde's personal charm in entertaining his guests. What is forgotten about "Caleb" is that he was one of the great raconteurs of his time and that his wit spiced his dinners far more subtly than even the celebrated seasoning of the dishes.

The parties culminated in 1905 with one which not only hurt his reputation but cast suspicion upon the operations of the insurance companies in general. It would be superfluous to tell in detail here of the fancy-dress ball in which Sherry's was rather naïvely transformed into a facsimile of the French court of Louis XVI at Versailles. The American public was less impressed by the irony of the historical setting with its near coincidence with revolution than with the report that it had cost $200,000. A later, more accurate, estimate of $75,000 failed to appease the public ire, and the appointment of the Armstrong Committee to investigate the doings of all insurance companies, plus the resulting drastic legislation, seem to have been the direct result of the Sherry extravagance. It was at this point that young Hyde—still under thirty—went to live in France and sublimate his bitterness in good works there.

That his immoderate and often dictatorial ways were balanced by a wide erudition and charm of manner is remembered by those who knew him best. Many anecdotes, some of which are, of course, apocryphal, are told of him. Once, at a dinner, on being introduced to a lady he had never seen before, he immediately asked if she knew the definition of adultery. On her blushing "No" he said, "Why, the wrong man in the right place, of course." At a Paris dinner he soon discovered that the lady on his left was afflicted with what Madison Avenue has diagnosed as halitosis. Through dinner, he avoided her remarks but when the cheese was passed he turned to her suddenly, "Vous dites, Madame?" he is said to have said.

He returned in later years to New York. He did not come often to the Century, but when he was there he was subdued. He is remembered as seeming solemn and literal—quite the reverse of his usual appearance. Perhaps he came too seldom to become familiar with the Round Table, where his humor might have found ready response. Hyde lived to be eighty-three; he had been a Centurion for fifty-seven years.

William Raymond Jelliffe

Doctor Jelliffe was a Presbyterian minister who was also an effective organizer and administrator. The principal work of his career was in the New York City Mission Society of which he was, successively, executive vice-president, president, and chairman. His special interest there was the expansion of the Mission's work among New York's Spanish-speaking people—an activity that has become a major part of the Society's program. In the same direction his assistance was of great value in establishing the Second Spanish Evangelical Church in East Fourteenth Street and the Society's Harlem Branch, Camp Sharparoon in Dover Plains, New York.

The Society's staff members gratefully remember Jelliffe's strenuous efforts to keep it going during the depression years, for he did not let a single one of his workers go. Also, as chairman of the social services committee of the Presbytery of New York, he was able to raise support for the desperate unemployed in that tragic time.

He was a graduate of Union Theological Seminary. For thirteen years he served the Sea and Land Church and then became associate minister of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church under Centurion Henry Sloane Coffin.

He seldom preached in the Church but was usually in the chancel during services. The story is told of him that he used to look down the pews, note which ones had new or strange faces, and then send a note to the head usher telling him to spot each person as he went out. In this way he got to know the newcomers and to show his friendliness toward them. He loved people and had sensitive understanding of character.

Middlebury College in Vermont gave him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1930. His last years after he had passed eighty were spent at Princeton, where he suffered his final long illness.

The Century knew him from 1936.

Edward Johnson

A train carrying the Metropolitan Opera Company on tour drew into Bloomington, Indiana, in a downpour of rain. The station would accommodate about a third of the orchestra. This left the rest of the musicians, the chorus, the ballet, and the principals with the choice of staying aboard or going out into the pouring rain. Nerves got dangerously on edge. "Touring," remembers a Centurion member of the company, "is an intimacy closer than holy matrimony . . . it brings out the worst and it brings out the best." But at that critical point in Bloomington, a magnificent tenor voice rose above the noise of the storm. "Oh What a Beautiful Mornin' " sang Edward Johnson walking through the cars. Instantly the spirits of everyone went up. It was impossible not to laugh, and Johnson knew that these people could not laugh and kill one another at the same time. No one asked if this was dignified behavior for the general manager of an internationally famous opera. It was "Eddie," and Eddie could do no wrong.

Edward Johnson began his musical career as a soprano choir boy in Guelph, Ontario. His first "aria" was sung in Sunday School; its name was "Throw Out the Life-Line." While still a boy, he took part in a regimental band and ran a minstrel show to make money for the band's instruments. His first tenor role was in the operetta The Waltz Dream by Oskar Strauss. In it he made enough money to go to Europe to study singing for grand opera. For three years his master was Vincenzo Lombardi who had taught Caruso.

By 1912, when he was thirty-four, he was ready for his debut in Padua. To get recognition as an opera singer in Italy, he had been obliged to change his name to Eduardo di Giovanni—a free translation of his own. His Padua role was in Andrea Chenier but soon he was singing at the Scala in Milan: in the first Italian Parsifal, in Alfano's L'Ombria di Don Giovanni, in Pizzetti's Fedra and in the new short operas of Puccini, Il Tabarro and Gianni Schicchi. His success in these and other operas in which he created new leads came to the attention of the Chicago Opera Company, which brought him back to America in 1919. He stayed with this company for three years, and then he joined the Met in New York and, under his own name, became best known in the part of Avito in L'Amore dei Tre Re. His first appearance in the Met was in this role in 1922. His last New York performance was in Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande in March, 1935. The following month he was named general manager.

It was a difficult post, demanding resourcefulness, energy, stamina, and many new talents. It required both artistic judgment and the capacity for organizing and working with an immense diversity of more or less temperamental folk. Besides all this, his job included lifting the Met out of the depression, reviving its waning finances, and putting it on a firm economic footing. Incidentally, it involved dealing with powerful and occasionally cantankerous labor unions. Yet he was loved by the lowliest of the employees. When he retired, the employees made this statement: "We, better than the general public, know what financial, artistic, and managerial problems you have had to solve to maintain the Metropolitan's position and prestige. For this and for making our opera company truly representative of the best in American music and musical artists, we honor you."

It is told that once, when he was called on to speak at a dinner honoring Jack Rosenberg, president of Local 802, he recalled that Rosenberg had been a drummer in the orchestra of The Waltz Dream. "When I was in musical comedy," Johnson said, "our guest of honor used to look up at me. Now that I am general manager of the Metropolitan I look up at him."

Although he brought many foreign conductors—such men as Bruno Walter, Sir Thomas Beecham, George Szell, and Fritz Reiner—to the Met he took the greatest pride in the opportunities he was able to give to American artists.

His time in the Century was unhappily brief. He was elected after his retirement when he had gone to live in his birthplace, Guelph, Ontario. But he came when he could and especially enjoyed the dinners of welcome to the new members. He took much interest in the musical career of William Daniel's daughter whom he met when she graduated from the Juilliard School.

At his death, the New York Times and the Herald Tribune paid editorial tribute to him. The Times said, in conclusion: "Cultivated, ardent, witty and wise, he was, in Chaucer's words, a parfait, gentle knight."

Albert Richard Lamb

The Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center, in the establishment of which Columbia University and the Presbyterian Hospital collaborated, owed much to the tireless and constructive efforts of Albert Lamb. To his exceptional skill as a physician and his special talent for diagnosis, Doctor Lamb added a great capacity for negotiation and organization and, finally, a literary facility uncommon in a man whose medical occupation was so urgent. For he not only made his abundant contributions to the making of the Center, but he wrote its story in his History of a Great Medical Adventure, published in 1955.

After graduating from Yale in 1903, Albert Lamb received his medical degree from the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University in 1907. He served his internship at Presbyterian Hospital and followed this by two years' service as bacteriologist and pathologist. He began teaching in 1913 and was appointed Columbia's professor of clinical medicine in 1922. Meanwhile, he had gone overseas as major in the Army Medical Corps in the First World War. In 1919 he served in Paris with the American Commission to Negotiate Peace.

His important work in developing the Medical Center was completed in 1928. In 1940 he was made president of Presbyterian Hospital's medical board. In the Second World War, he helped develop the Blood-for-Britain program which included a large blood plasma processing center at Presbyterian Hospital. In 1952 he retired from active practice and devoted the rest of his life to writing.

Doctor Lamb was a quiet man, respected for his wisdom and penetrating understanding. One of his close associates tells that he had a delightful sense of humor, was frank in his opinions, but was always a sympathetic listener. It was "unfortunate," said this Centurion doctor friend "that he, like the rest of us in these busy days, could not enjoy the Century more." He had been a member since 1926.

James Warren Lane

Having been a bird watcher since he was five and, in his adult years, an earnest student of bird life, Jim Lane was shocked when a friend suggested that he come to a blind some morning and shoot ducks. But the friend said shooting was only a small part of the pleasure, that he himself was such a bad shot that he almost never hit a bird. The fun, he said, was being away from all the brouhaha of life—being able to think and dream and meditate. So Lane tried it; he enjoyed meditating and especially enjoyed seeing his friend miss all the ducks.

They lived, these friends, the watcher and the shooter, at St. James, Long Island, where there were plenty of birds. Jim Lane used to lecture about them to fascinated local groups, and his articles for the paper inspired many watchers. But ornithology was not Lane's profession. He was a historian of art and a critic. He did special research for the National Gallery in Washington. In this work he was meticulous and precise. His field was American painting and his particular enthusiasms were for nineteenth-century artists. He wrote a book about Whistler and another in which he explored the beginnings of modern art. Here he followed the sequence of Cézanne, Van Gogh, Gauguin, Matisse, Derain, Demuth to Georgia O'Keefe and Jean Charlot. He omitted Picasso.

"Picasso," he wrote, "has a feverish power of invention, but his inability to progress in his art has left him, in the final analysis, a great improviser rather than a great creative painter."

Greatness in any art, Lane thought, depended largely on the honest belief of the artist in his creation. "Sincerity . . . is the least common denominator of greatness. But there is one more condition. A great painting must have a spiritual quality. It must be experience humanized. The novels of Dickens and Tolstoi, the laments and marches of Tchaikowski, have this quality as do the paintings of Cézanne, Van Gogh and Charlot."

James Warren Lane was born in Brooklyn in 1898. He was educated at Yale, Harvard, and Cambridge. As an undergraduate at Yale, he was editor of the "Lit," and after graduation, he edited the Authors' League Bulletin. From 1939 to 1943 he was associate editor of Art News and from 1945 to 1951 he was a research assistant at the National Gallery. From 1936 to 1940 he was visiting lecturer on American painting at New York University.

He was a shy, sensitive man, deeply religious. He had a quiet sense of humor of which he himself was often the target. He was greatly loved by friends, neighbors, and co-workers.

Ambrose Lansing

Those of us who gathered at the Round Table before lunch were glad when Ambrose joined us, for he had a rare understanding of the pleasure of true conversation. Yet few of us who talked with him then realized the extent and variety of his achievements or the degree of his scholarship, because he so seldom talked his own shop. Occasionally he would let drop a word or two about his home on Roaring Brook near Chappaqua, but only his intimates knew that his weekend gardening included the building of models of Egyptian tombs with self-locking doors.

Ambrose was an Egyptologist who spent many digging seasons in the Valley of the Kings. He and Centurion Herbert Winlock uncovered some of the finest models of ancient Egyptian ship, farm, and trade practices that are now in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. They found these lovely miniature replicas of the people and things that made up the everyday life of that fabled land in the tombs of kings. Lansing discovered some of the finest of them quite by accident in a spot he had already explored and was about to leave when it appeared that a pile of sand from the excavations was gradually growing smaller. Hastily shoveling the sand away he uncovered a crack beneath it. The beam of a flashlight through the narrow slit showed a great galaxy of figures.

A trait which colleagues remember was Ambrose's selfless fairness in his competitive relations with others in his field, whether they were private collectors or museum curators. Jealousy was quite foreign to his thinking.

Ambrose was born of American parents in Cairo in 1891.

At thirteen he came to the United States after acquiring in his childhood his life interest. He took his A.B. at Washington and Jefferson College in 1911. Immediately after his graduation, he went to work as field archaeologist in Egypt, though his summers were spent in Germany as a student at Leipzig University until 1914. In 1922 he was appointed assistant curator, in 1926 associate curator, and in 1939 curator of the department of Egyptian art in the Metropolitan Museum. He was a member of the American Oriental Society, Chicago's Oriental Institute, the Egypt Exploration Society, and the American Museums Association.

He left us too soon, and we miss him.

Samuel McCune Lindsay

The crowning achievement of Samuel Lindsay's academic career was the reorganization of Columbia's Academy of Political Science, making it a link, so to speak, between gown and town. This Academy had been in existence since 1880, but it was a moribund existence till Lindsay took hold of it more than a quarter century later. But from the small group it was when he became its president in 1910, he raised its membership to ten thousand, including representation from virtually every country in the world. Its meetings became animated forums with addresses by statesmen, candidates for office, diplomats, high civil servants, labor leaders, professors, and lawyers and discussion on the topics they introduced. These broke open any professorial ivory towers that may have existed and taught their inmates something about the rough-and-tumble of politics and the economic realities in the business world.

Lindsay is said to have been the first professor in the field of labor legislation at Columbia. When the United States first took possession of Puerto Rico, he was appointed its Commissioner of Education; later he was the first chancellor of the University of Puerto Rico. On the fifteenth anniversary of its founding the university gave him an honorary doctorate.

Samuel Lindsay was born in Pittsburgh in 1869. After graduating from the University of Pennsylvania and after taking postgraduate courses in Halle, Berlin, Vienna, Rome, and Paris, he received his LL.D. degree. For about ten years before he came to Columbia, he was professor of sociology at the University of Pennsylvania. He entered Columbia in 1907 as professor of social legislation.

His extra-curricular activities included the presidency of the Men's Association of the Bach Presbyterian Church, and to it he brought a coterie of distinguished speakers. He was later elected one of the ruling elders of the Church. Though modesty prevented his speaking often, his rare words of wise advice were treasured by those who heard him.

He lived to be ninety and was a Centurion for fifty-seven years.

James McBey

The Century is fortunate in owning seven of James McBey's etchings. These were chosen from the hundreds of drawings, paintings, and sketches he made as official artist for the British Expeditionary Forces under Lord Allenby in 1917. Most of the others are in the British Museum and the Imperial War Museum in London.

McBey, as his name assures us, was a Scot. At fifteen he seemed to be headed for a banking career. He worked then for the North of Scotland Bank in Aberdeen. But even then his talent for drawing led him into night study of the art of etching. He was self-taught, but he made quick progress. By the time he had made sixty experimental plates, he forgot about banking and made art his vocation. His first exhibition was at Goupil's gallery in London in 1911.

His insistent eagerness for new subjects led him into a roving life. He wandered all over Britain, then over the Continent and to North Africa. The war interrupted this foot-loose interval, and in 1916 he joined the British army in France. But happily his talent was recognized, and he was able, though in uniform, to go on with his life work. The British army was wiser, in those days, than the American. Too many of our artists were wasted in the infantry, for which they were peculiarly unfitted, but we learned our lesson in time for the Second World War.

After he left the service, McBey worked for a time in Venice, but then he drifted to New York, where he did some important portrait etchings. He lived at first in the Gainsborough Studios on Central Park South, but this conventional neighborhood bored him, and he moved down into East John Street a block from the waterfront. All about him were fish markets and shops for fitting out ships. These had descended directly from the enterprises of the earliest colonial days and offered a wealth of material for McBey's pencil. He became an American citizen in 1942.

But even the rich, multicolored scenes of New York's lower East Side could not hold him forever. The adventurous spirit was still strong in his sixties, and he spent the last years of his life in Tangier, where he did some of his best work.

James McBey was distinguished by his independence of all schools. He never imitated. His work has the freshness of original thought; he approached each new subject from scratch, as it were, unbiased by formula or prejudice.

George Whitney Martin

George Martin was the first historian of the Century. The office was created in 1950. Before that, memorials to those who had gone to join the Century's immortals had been composed by the secretary. But as the secretary's business had multiplied with the years, the burdens of this additional task had become more than one man could bear. So this new post was devised, and George was asked to tell, each year, the story of those who had left us.

When the first yearbook after his appointment appeared, Centurions read a new kind of tribute. The historian's report was so instantly interesting that we read it through, as absorbed by the memorials to strangers as if they had been our close friends. We wished we had known these men.

We were stirred by the almost biblical directness and economy of the prose, yet we found warmth in it, too, and color—even gaiety. It seemed as if the men George had written about were still alive and would always be so in the clubhouse. Thus, he interpreted the spirit of the Century—the intimation of immortality that is forever present there—as no one else has quite done.

George used to say that members were friendly to him in the hope of a good memorial after they were "pegged out." But it never occurred to anyone that he himself could die. We still expect to meet him—in the lower hall, perhaps, swinging the army knapsack he used for a brief case; or in the East Room with a group listening to his exuberant eloquence in defense of an idea or to the shattering wit of his disapproval.

George was born in Rochester, New York, in 1887. He was the son of a well-loved Centurion, Edward Sanford Martin, a brilliant writer and the first editor on John Ames Mitchell's Life. George went to Groton School and Harvard College. His class in Harvard was 1910, but he finished a year early and entered the Harvard Law School. He was admitted to the bar in 1913. He began his practice with the firm of Byrne and Cutcheon and, in 1918, joined that of Marvin, Hooker and Roosevelt, of which Franklin Roosevelt was a partner. Five years later Langdon Marvin and Greenville Emmet joined with George to form the partnership of Emmet, Marvin and Martin. With this firm he remained until his death.

George's participation in the First World War was told in a letter he wrote in 1940 to Frank Miles, editor of the Iowa Legionnaire who had questioned his patriotism. Having read a report that George was one of a group which had publicly favored the entrance of the United States into the Second World War with Germany, Miles wrote to ask: "What fighting did you do in the last war? Are you now of an age of physical and mental fitness which would enable you to do military service? . . . Kindly reply by return mail." George replied:

"Answering your questions: In the last war I enlisted in the United States Army in April, 1917, and was honorably discharged in March, 1919. I received the divisional citation for gallantry in action during the Argonne-Meuse offensive. Is this enough, or will you have it inch by inch and minute by minute with a full box score?

"Owing to the fact that I have supported myself without the assistance of the taxpayers ever since being discharged from the Army, I am now of an age and of a physical and mental fitness which will enable me to do military service. The only possible question of my mental fitness arises out of the fact that I am a member of the American Legion.

"It is written in the Scriptures that Samson inflicted immense loss on the Philistines with the jawbone of an ass. If you will be good enough to send me your lower maxillary, I will forward it to the War Department in the full confidence that the country will hardly need more than this."

This correspondence was printed in the New York Herald Tribune in June, 1940. After Pearl Harbor, George, then fifty-four, was commissioned colonel of the 4th New York Infantry, and at the war's end he was brigadier-general of the 5th New York Artillery Brigade.

Though a lawyer by profession, writing was his constant avocation. He once quoted Kipling as saying that in a law office a man is neither seen nor heard. Perhaps it was to balance this silence that his urge to write was so strong. George was a fighting writer. His words cut sharp and deep. His irony withered the coward, the bigot, the hypocrite, and all who would limit freedom of the mind. He was intolerant of the yes-man and of him who conforms through fear. "The fear of God," he wrote, "is the beginning of wisdom. The fear of men is the grave of freedom."

Some of his writing was pure fun and hilariously funny but mainly it was the expression of a crusader or a rebel. Unfortunately much of it had not the wide circulation it deserved. An example of this was an article entitled "The Duty of Rebellion," published in the Groton School Quarterly—a sweeping attack on the attempt to regulate morals by statute in which the special target was national prohibition: "There is a silent referendum in the heart and minds of men on every important enactment by a Legislature and on every important decision by a Court which involves a fundamental principle of civil liberty. Without a favorable issue in that referendum, the statute and the decision alike are written in water."

For more than fifteen years, George was president of the board of directors of the Brearley School for girls. Of his performance there, Millicent McIntosh wrote in the Brearley Bulletin: "His intellectual gifts alone could never have achieved the enormous influence he had on the school. His extraordinary charm and wit and kindness made him able to persuade as well as to agitate; his deep belief in education as a means to self-fulfilment was part of his essential liberalism."

George was deeply religious. This never blinded him to the smugness and hypocrisy of certain clerics (including bishops); on the contrary his ironic words toward them stemmed from the very fact of his candid faith. He was bitter, for instance, toward a House of Bishops who, in convention, linked alcohol and narcotics in their exhortation to obey the prohibition law. Yet he was a vestryman of St. George's Church in New York and, with his family, a regular attendant there.

In his wallet after he died was found this quotation from a speech of Socrates. It is a key to his persistent faith. "Wherefor my counsel is, that we hold fast to the heavenly way and follow after justice and virtue always, considering that the soul is immortal and able to endure every sort of good and every sort of evil. Thus shall we live dear to one another and to the gods, both while remaining here and when, like conquerors in the games who go round to gather gifts, we receive our reward. And it shall be well with us both in this life and in the pilgrimage of a thousand years which we have been reciting."

So be it, George. You have brought a degree of immortality to our dead; you deserve it wholly for yourself.

Dunlevy Milbank

Milbank was one of those men whose quiet philanthropy sustains the welfare institutions of our capitalist democracy. His special interest was children's aid. The Dunlevy Milbank Center for 3,000 teen-agers and younger children recently opened at Fifth Avenue and 118th Street, New York, owes its existence to Milbank's million-dollar gift. He also aided the research into the affliction known as retrolental fibroplasia which causes blindness in premature babies. He established the Milbank Home for Convalescent Boys at Valhalla, New York, and he gave much to the Institute of Crippled and Disabled. He is on record as having contributed more to the Children's Aid Society than any other individual in its history.

Dunlevy Milbank was born in New York City in 1878 and was educated at the Cutler School and at Yale. He took a law degree at the New York Law School in 1902. He practiced law for several years, interesting himself particularly in his family estates.

His favorite recreation was golf. But he was also a judge of horses. With these he took prizes all over the United States. At one time he belonged to a volunteer fire company.

He spent whatever time he could at the Century. He served on the Board of Management and took great interest in the Club's activities. He was a familiar figure in the dining room where he always sat at a table for four, usually with the same companions. In the latter part of his life he was confined to a wheelchair, and it must have taken great courage for him to come to the Club as often as he did. But no one heard him complain, even when his suffering and difficulty of movement were evident to all who knew him.

He was a member for thirty-six years.

George Henry Nettleton

The whole of George Nettleton's adult life was devoted to Yale. He prepared at Andover and then entered the class of 1896 in Yale College. After his graduation he spent a year at the University of Geneva and returned to New Haven to accept an instructorship in English. In 1900, he received his Ph.D. degree. He was promoted to assistant professor in 1906. He became full professor of English in Yale's Sheffield Scientific School in 1916, succeeding the late Wilbur Cross. He was appointed professor of English in Yale College in 1921 and was named Lamson Professor of English twelve years later.

Nettleton's deep interest in international education took him to Paris during the First World War as director of the Yale Bureau there. He organized and was first director of the American University Union in Europe—that immensely valuable institution which made it possible for American servicemen to study at French and English universities after the Armistice. For this undertaking he was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. At this time, he also held lectureships at the Sorbonne in Paris and at Cambridge in England. He was a trustee of Vassar College from 1919 to 1939 and was acting president there in 1922-23. In 1937, after President Charles Seymour took office, he became dean of Yale College.

In addition to his scholarly pursuits, he was much interested in athletics. For a while, he was chairman of the Board of Control of Yale Athletics. These years from 1925 to 1930 were a period of expansion—as they were in all American universities—and adjustment of sports and studies was necessary to meet the increase in enrollment. The planning of the Payne Whitney Gymnasium also required much of Nettleton's attention.

Nettleton was known for his thoroughness and his meticulous awareness of detail, but he is also remembered by those who were close to him as a kind and generous man. He is said to have devised and supported many private or hidden charities. It was his custom to invite his subordinates home to Sunday dinner and talk with them about sports as well as literature. He also took a personal interest in the students with whom he worked both in the Sheffield Scientific School and in the College. It was characteristic of him to write the history of Yale men in the First World War. He knew most of these boys well and he saw in them something of the spirit of Rupert Brooke.

George Nettleton lived to be eighty-four. For more than half of his life—forty-eight years—he was a member of the Century.

Peter Oliver

In much of his activity Peter Oliver was, in the best sense (the Century sense), an amateur. His interests were varied and he never went half-way into any of them. He was an accomplished sailor and master of any crisis that might arise on a boat. As one who has often cruised with him says, he "loved nothing better than to be at the wheel with the lee rail under." But he was also a discriminating book collector: not primarily because he liked fine printing or binding or because the books were "firsts" but because their substance attracted him.

It was as a scholar, however, that Oliver was most distinguished, and the greater part of his time was devoted to research and critical writing. He was a classicist—an especially enthusiastic Latinist with particular attention to Horace. His book on Horace was completed a year or so before his death and has not yet been published. He had, too, an interest in seventeenth-century literature. The titles of his books, some of which he had printed on little job presses, suggest the variety of his explorations. Among them are Saints of Chaos, A New Chronicle of the Compleat Angler, A Galaxy of Disagreeable Women, and Adventures of Joseph Sell, the Great Traveler.

Peter Oliver graduated from Harvard College in 1922. Before he began his scholarly pursuits, he had a job with the Cunard Line organizing the student-tourist class for trans-Atlantic travel. After that he was executive secretary of the Good Government Association in Boston. Later, he settled down in Katonah, New York, and it was there that he accumulated his fine library.

Of his doings in the Club a close Centurion friend has written: "Peter loved the Century as he loved all good things in life. He was often to be seen coming in from the New York Public Library, where he had spent a morning working, carrying on his back his vast green baize bag with the cards that he had accumulated in his researches. . . . There he would be with his face wreathed in smiles as he saw a friend who might join him for a drink or lunch, filled with some anecdote—generally, if it was about something he had been doing, he would be the butt of the story . . . delighted at any triumphs of his friends, and always hopeful that he or they would succeed in doing the things that ought to be done and that no one but such 'damn fools' as they would undertake."

But most of his time at the Century was spent in the Library. Here he would bury himself in the Club's Loeb Classical Library or, perhaps, confer with the librarian on material for his study on "The Year 1800 in the United States" in which he investigated trends in navigation, medicine, literature, and other directions. When a book he needed was missing, he would hunt for it in the bookstores, buy it, and present it to the library.

It was a great pity that Peter Oliver should have died so young. Such men are rare and should stay with us a long time to enrich our lives.

Alfred Townsend Osgood

"He was not guilty," writes a fellow physician of Alfred Osgood, "of writing a book." Whether or not this Centurion colleague meant that, therefore, he was a good doctor, there is abundant evidence that he was that in addition to being a good companion. He was a quiet man; he listened more than he talked; and his bountiful generosity was cherished by its beneficiaries but forgotten by him and never publicized.

Doctor Osgood was educated at Yale and the College of Physicians and Surgeons before it became the medical department of Columbia. He received his doctor's degree in 1899, served on the resident staff of New York's Presbyterian Hospital for two years, and began practice as an associate of the late F. Tilden Brown. His special study of urology brought him to the New York University-Bellevue Medical Center. From 1912 to 1936 he was professor of urology at New York University Medical School and was later made professor emeritus.

In the course of his career he was on the visiting staff of Bellevue Hospital and consulting surgeon in urology at Bellevue, the French Hospital of New York, the New York City Cancer Institute, Northern Westchester Hospital of Mount Kisco, Bronxville's Lawrence Hospital, and Muhlenberg Hospital in Plainfield, New Jersey. He retired in 1947 at the age of seventy-four. Unhappily, the last years of his life were darkened by a prolonged and painful illness, but through it he maintained the forbearance that must come from profound medical understanding.

Alfred Osgood lived to be eighty-six, and he was a Centurion for thirty-four years.

Thomas Ignatius Parkinson

What is the right "type" for an insurance man? In his younger days Thomas Parkinson was advised that he was "not the type" for the insurance business. Perhaps that is why he became president and later chairman of the board of the Equitable Life Assurance Company of America. Perhaps that is also why during the twenty-seven years in which he held these offices the company's assets were multiplied by six. And possibly if he had been the "right type" instead of being an extremely forceful and intelligent individual, he would never have become a Centurion.

Parkinson, however, was not an insurance man, pure and simple. During a long and strenuous career, his talents were directed into many channels. Before insurance came teaching. He was professor of legislation in the Law and Political Science faculties of Columbia University; then dean of the Columbia Law School. He was director of Columbia's Legislative Drafting Research Fund and chairman of the fund's administrative board. For a time he was legislative counsel to the Senate and for two terms he was president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. In the First World War he was an army major.

Thomas Parkinson was born in Philadelphia seventy-seven years ago. In 1902 he graduated cum laude from the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. For five years he practiced law in Pennsylvania; then he came to New York to work with a charter commission which prepared a new administrative code for the city.

From his law school days he had been especially interested in insurance. During part of the First World War, he worked with the War Department in drafting the act that created the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. It was partly this that interested Equitable in him and, in 1920, he was invited to join it as second vice-president. He became president in 1927. During his long career there he interested himself particularly in foreign affairs, and he was primarily responsible for liquidating a German debt which had gone back to 1871.

He was a member of the Century for thirty-eight years.

Louis Wetherbee Pitt

Louis Pitt succeeded Walter Russell Bowie in 1940 as rector of Grace Church in New York. The greatest challenge that presented itself to him at that time was the development of Grace Church School, a project which grew out of a boy's choir school. Under Doctor Pitt's imaginative and vigorous leadership it acquired a registration of more than two hundred boys and girls. The school extended its teaching beyond the fundamentals and made a special point of "interesting the children in the world around them," and the best secondary schools were eager to enroll its graduates. The rector had a way with young people that inspired their confidence and affection.

Louis Pitt was born in Middletown, Connecticut, in 1893. It was natural for him to go to Middletown's Wesleyan. When he was graduated, in 1915, he entered Berkeley Divinity School, where he remained until 1918 when he was ordained a deacon. Later he was consecrated a priest of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He served as curate in Christ Church, Newark, and as assistant in St. Luke's in Montclair. His first rectorship was at St. Mark's Church in Newark; seven years later he accepted a call to St. Mary's in Ardmore, Pennsylvania.

His church gave him all kinds of honors. For four years from 1947 to 1951 he served as a member of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York; he was awarded a trusteeship of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine; he was appointed Dean of the Convocation of Manhattan and a deputy to the 1949 General Convention of the Episcopal Church in San Francisco. He was also president of the Liberal Evangelicals. In 1948 as visiting chaplain of Columbia University he delivered the invocation when Dwight Eisenhower was installed as president of the university.

Dr. Pitt's close friends knew of the quiet help he gave to those who needed it. His many kindnesses, says a Centurion who knew him well, "were very real, unusually so, and straight out of a warm heart and a successful delicacy in making the recipients happy and comfortable about it."

It is a pity that a minister of such inspiration and friendliness to his fellow men should have to leave this rich service at an age when most of us are in our prime.

Richardson Pratt

The Century has been lucky in its treasurers. In other places those who control the finances are often querulous, didactic, or gloomy. But for us there has been a long succession of stewards of our exchequer as balanced as the books they supervised and men with happy tempers besides. Dick Pratt followed in the tradition of Henry Baldwin. He could look calmly at both tribulation and prosperity, and his humorous, easy-going manner hid many hours of strenuous work when he wrestled with frustrating problems in his devoted attention to the health of our Club.

It takes imagination to keep a couple of hundred men amused and entertained by a balance sheet. Yet no one dropped asleep while Dick was on the platform giving his annual report: telling what the figures meant in words that we could all understand—even those of us who could never balance our own check books—and telling what had happened to the Century in the year behind and what would come in the one ahead. While he talked, the future looked bright—not because he was deceptive in his optimism but rather because in the image he gave us, the thought of money receded behind the other values: as long as the Century was true to itself, it must survive.

Richardson Pratt was born in Glen Cove, Long Island, sixty-four years ago, and he lived there most of his life. He graduated from Amherst College in 1915, and five years later he joined the Standard Oil Company in New York. Meanwhile, for the First World War, he had organized a company of Glen Cove Negroes, a group to which he gave the highest praise. While serving overseas with the 369th infantry, he won the rank of captain.

Standard Oil was a natural for Dick. His grandfather, Charles Pratt was a co-founder with John D. Rockefeller of the original company. Dick joined the company in 1920 and was with it until 1944, when he left to become the senior partner of Charles Pratt and Company, a firm mainly concerned with the investment business of the large Pratt family. During the last fifteen years he interested himself in a diversity of activities, including Pratt Institute in Brooklyn and the American Academy in Rome, of which, in 1958, he was elected secretary. He was a trustee of Amherst and of Vassar.

It was a sad day for the Century when Dick left us. In the twenty-one years of his membership, he had endeared himself to many men. He placed a milestone on the road of our honorable march. His memory will be cherished not only by his generation but by the younger Centurions who felt his kindly influence. Everyone who knew Dick Pratt was happy in his presence and proud of his friendship.

Lawson Purdy

If he had lived another fortnight, Lawson Purdy would have been ninety-six. When he was ninety, he complained that the days were all too short for all the things he wanted to do. Yet many of us would be happy to have filled such an abundance of days with works as useful as his. The goal of much of his effort was, as one obituary pointed out, a "safer, cleaner and more beautiful" New York. His signal achievements were in city planning and tax reform.

A native of Hyde Park, New York, Purdy received his higher education at Trinity College, Hartford, taking his B.A. degree there at the age of twenty-one. While he was still in college, he acquired his lifelong interest in the subject of taxation. Like many young men of the time, he was an eager champion of Henry George and a vigorous proponent of the single tax. Later, he became so absorbed in tax reform that he abandoned the legal career on which he had embarked in order to give full time to the fight for a scientific tax program.

In 1906 he began his service as president of the New York Department of Taxes under Mayor McClellan and held this position for eleven years. He was an officer of the city's first zoning commission in 1916 and general director of the Charity Organization Society from the end of the First World War until the bottom of the depression in the early 1930's. In his last years in that position he added to that difficult task strenuous activity on the city's Emergency Work and Relief administration of which he was chairman.

"Fifth Avenue," said Purdy when its charm was threatened by the erection of high apartment buildings, "is the show street of the City of New York and anything which impairs its beauty will impair the whole city." He vigorously supported a movement begun by the Fifth Avenue Association to prevent such disfigurement.

He outlived most of his intimates. Perhaps his closest friend in the Century was the Club's beloved treasurer, Henry de Forest Baldwin, and much of the time he spent in the clubhouse was in the East Room, Baldwin's favorite spot. He was an arresting figure with his erect bearing and shock of white hair, and even in the Century, where no one turns to look at Presidents or Supreme Court judges, it was difficult not to cast a backward glance at Lawrence Purdy.

He was with us twenty-eight years.

Cornelius Packard Rhoads

In 1956 "Dusty" Rhoads, as his intimates called him, predicted that a chemical control of cancer would come in ten years. "Some authorities," he is quoted as saying in an interview, "think that we cannot solve the cancer problem until we have made a great, basic, unexpected discovery, perhaps in some apparently unrelated field. I disagree. I think we know enough to go ahead and make a frontal attack with all our forces. . . . We'll follow every promising lead, and we know a lot of them. If the ivory-tower men solve the problems ahead of us, we won't feel we've wasted our time."

No one who knows of the intense work of research that

Doctor Rhoads has done could believe that he had wasted a moment. And as director of the Sloan-Kettering Institute for Cancer Research he was able to inspire hundreds of technicians, chemists, and laboratory assistants to do their part in this greatest detective work of our time.

"Dusty" Rhoads was born in Springfield, Massachusetts, in 1898. After going to college at Bowdoin, he spent four years in the Harvard Medical School from which he graduated, magna cum laude in 1924. After a year as intern in Boston's Peter Brent Hospital, he was appointed a fellow of the Trudeau sanitarium in New York State. His work on the staff of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research began after two years as an instructor in pathology in the Harvard Medical School. In 1940 he was made director of Memorial Center, and with this and the directorship of Sloan-Kettering in 1945 he became the head of what is said to be "the largest concentrated program for the study, treatment and cure of cancer in the world."

In the Second World War as colonel in the Army Medical Corps he interested himself in the receiving end of chemical warfare. For this work he was cited by the army as having "developed new methods of diagnosis and treatment for the relief of injuries due to toxic chemicals, and perfected a compound to counter the effects of blister gas. He also developed equipment for detecting gas in air, food and water." For these contributions he was awarded the Legion of Merit.

Rhoads was not a practicing physician. His life was devoted to the work and administration of medical research. It is upon this infinitely patient and meticulous inquiry that the hopes of millions must depend. It is sad to know that such a man's heart must fail at an age so relatively young; yet it is likely that he had already established a program which could be carried on without his active participation though the inspiring presence be gone.

A Centurion colleague tells of his abounding energy, his genial face, and his ready smile. In the many men and women he helped to develop techniques in their various branches of science he instilled an unwavering loyalty.

Carl Rungius

Carl was one of those Centurions who prove that the Century has no formula or type. He was, indeed, an artist and a distinguished one, but his subjects were far from the civilization most of us know, and a large part of his life was spent in rugged and lonely places inhabited only by the wild animals he loved to paint.

"Carl's real habitat," a Centurion friend wrote of him, "was in the moose country. He was more at home in camp than in the parlor. As an expert with the rifle due to his early training in Germany, his interest in wild life made him a natural sportsman. He knew his stuff—you can't fool sailors or hunters with abstractions."

A village near Berlin was the birthplace of Carl Rungius more than ninety years ago. His father was a Lutheran minister. Carl studied at the German Academy of Art under Peter Meierheim, then known through Europe as a talented painter of wild life. When, in 1894, after a tour of duty in the Prussian cavalry, he came to the United States, he found a rich field for his work in the West. He spent ten years hunting and painting, coming in 1904 to Banff in Alberta which became his headquarters for some thirty years. There he established a studio; to it he brought the prizes of his hunts and made the best of his paintings, using the dead animals arranged in characteristic poses for his models. In later years he was especially proud of a bearskin from a grizzly he had shot when he was seventy-eight.

He served on the advisory council of the National Academy of Design and was active in the Academy throughout his life. He exhibited there and in one annual exhibition he won the Ellen P. Speyer Memorial Award for his painting "Across the Barren." At another Academy show, he was given the first prize for his canvas "Lake Arthur."

When Hitler came to power in Germany, Rungius had a visit from an official of the German government who invited him to hunt and paint on the estates of Hitler and Goering. Pointing out a window which gave a wide view of the mountains that edged Bow Valley Carl replied: "These are my hunting grounds. I will come when your Fuehrer can offer me better than these, and greater freedom."

When he was over eighty, he flew by helicopter over the tundra in Alaska, taking photographs of the moose there which moved in great herds. This was a government assignment.

His work is preserved in private collections, in the New York Zoological Society, and in his Banff studio, which has been acquired by the Glen Bow Foundation of Calgary. The Century is fortunate in the possession of one of his moose paintings.

Carl Rungius was known for his even temperament, his striking individuality, never subject to the influences of schools of art, and, despite all the cultural revolutions of his time, his immunity to change.

Bernard Samuels

Doctor Samuels was so shy, so quiet, and so unassuming that a casual acquaintance would never have guessed that he had an international reputation or that he had held many of the highest offices in his profession in the United States. He was often at our clubhouse but usually in a dark corner, hunched over a desk, intensely concentrated, writing furiously.

"As far as I am aware," writes a Centurion acquaintance and colleague, "he took part in none of the activities in the Club. He rarely, if ever, had a meal there. I cannot remember ever seeing him sit down to visit or have a drink."

He gave the impression of being so utterly absorbed in his work that he had no time for anything else. Yet this work was not wholly confined to his profession. He was deeply interested in American history, particularly that of his native state, Virginia, in which he built a library and museum in connection with his home.

His profession was ophthalmology. He was an eye surgeon, a teacher whom, an associate says, "students would cut classes to hear," and a pathologist. His distinguished career reached its climax when he became president of The International Congress of Ophthalmology in 1954.

Bernard Samuels was born in Front Royal, Virginia, in 1879. Jefferson College in Philadelphia gave him his medical degree, and he then did postgraduate work for four years in Vienna, Prague, and Berlin. After studying under Professor Ernest Fuchs at the University of Virginia, he was appointed clinical instructor of ophthalmology at the Cornell University Medical College, a post he occupied for nearly thirty years. His work there was briefly interrupted by the First World War in which he served as a major in the Army Medical Corps.

Yet his arduous duties at Cornell Medical were not enough. In 1930 he added a term of teaching at The New York Eye and Ear Infirmary which led to his appointment as full surgeon there. Though his title changed to advisory surgeon and consulting pathologist in 1946, there was little question of retirement. In 1949 he was elected to the executive committee of the National Society for the Prevention of Blindness, and in 1953 he presided at the Seventeenth International Congress of Ophthalmology, which was attended by some 1,500 specialists. This meeting in New York was the second of its nature to be held in the United States.

As late as 1956 Doctor Samuels, then in his seventy-seventh year, helped establish the New York Infirmary's Institute of Ophthalmology of the Americas, designed primarily for postgraduate medical students from Latin America.

It seems a pity that in his twenty-two years of membership he knew so few Centurions, but we must be grateful for the incalculable value of his work to those whose sight was darkened.

Robert William Sawyer

It was said of Judge Sawyer—who was known as the First Citizen of Oregon—that his waste basket was more valuable than most men's libraries. In a long, continually active life, he had been a lumberman, a lawyer, a county judge, a newspaper editor and publisher, an ardent conservationist, a forester, a protector of wild life, and a promoter of projects that included state parks, highways, reclamation, irrigation, and the construction of public buildings. Although most of this activity was localized within his beloved adopted state, his correspondence ranged far and wide, inquiring into national issues and seeking or giving advice.

Robert Sawyer was born in Bangor, Maine, in 1880. He was educated at Exeter and at Harvard. He took his A.B. degree in 1902 and his LL.B. from the Harvard Law School in 1905. He was then admitted to the Massachusetts bar and practiced law for a time in Boston. But as a young man his interests were divided between a lawyer's office work and the forests of his native state as well as the natural resources of Massachusetts. Such a lover of nature and the outdoors could hardly be confined by an urban life, and when he learned of the great timber operations in Oregon, he migrated to that state, driving the last miles of the journey in a horse-drawn buggy.

But in the town of Bend in which he took a job as a lumber piler, the conflict between his interest in timber lore and the fondness for intellectual pursuits he had acquired in the East impelled him to look about for work that would meet both urgencies. He found it in the Bend Bulletin, a newspaper owned by George Palmer Putnam. He had come to Putnam's attention through some verse he had submitted to the paper and Putnam hired him. Three years later, in 1915, he bought the Bulletin.

The paper's editorial office was an ideal center from which to reach out and touch all the state's problems. He spent many days walking over the country, climbing the mountains, camping, always in the search of improvement in the ways of conserving the land, saving the trees, and giving sanctuary to all sorts of wild animals from antelope to ducks. He served on the Oregon Highway Commission; he was known as the father of the state's park system; he was county judge of Deschutes County for seven years: he took special interest in the University of Oregon and made abundant contributions to its library, to the Oregon State Library, and to the Oregon Historical Society.

In his paper he was forthright and frank, sometimes stepping on political toes as he wrote, but with scrupulous regard for accuracy. He had nothing but contempt for slipshod journalism and never let an error go unchallenged. He was a steadfast Republican and said, in no uncertain terms, what he thought of the New Deal.

Like many Centurions who live far from New York, he was not able to come often to the Club, but he was happy in his membership. He was elected twenty-one years ago.

Edgar Craig Schenck

When the manager of the grocery store at Riverhead, Long Island, was shown Edgar Schenck's obituary, he was astonished to see that his friend had held an exalted position as museum director. "Why, I liked him," he said, implying surprise that he could be friends with so important a person. "He came by in a beat-up car, dressed in a sweater. He told me he worked at the Brooklyn Museum, but I thought he was the janitor!"

That was Schenck. When he went with his family to the Riverside cottage, he pulled down the curtain behind him. He would stop all the clocks and watches in the house so that time had no more meaning for him. Then he would dig clams, play games with his wife and children, and conjure up out of his lively fancy images that they could all laugh at.

His career was devoted exclusively to art. He was greatly concerned with the museum's technique of presenting art to the public and especially insistent that it maintain a high level of taste. To him a museum was primarily an educational institution; its entertainment value (which the word implies) comes second. He was particularly anxious to make modern art comprehensible to people outside the magic circle of artists. To him the integration of art with life was a major premise.

Edgar Schenck was born in Hot Springs, North Carolina, in 1909, the son of a clergyman. He took his bachelor's degree at Princeton (where he was a member of Phi Beta Kappa) in 1931. Three years later he received his M.F.A. from the Princeton graduate school. In this time he made three archaeological field trips in Europe. After completing his studies, he married and lived for a time in Honolulu, where his parents were. There he became instructor at the University of Hawaii. Within a year or so he was director of the Honolulu Academy of Arts. When he returned to the United States in 1947, he was appointed director of the Smith College Museum. In 1949 he went to Buffalo as director of the Albright Art Gallery and from there, in 1955, he came to the Brooklyn Museum.

One of his first acts there was the establishment of two $5,000 annual fellowships for training in museum procedures. Last year he made a lecture tour of India and Turkey for the State Department and it was in the course of that mission that he suffered his fatal heart attack.

Unhappily Schenck's death came less than a year after his election to the Century. His friends know what an ideal member he would have made. He enjoyed social occasions, liked good food and drink, was happy to sit late in the night talking informally and gaily about art.

In a year when so many Centurions passed ninety, it was sad to see one die at forty-nine.

Vladimir Gregoievitch Simkhovitch

There was something about Vladimir Simkhovitch that made you stop whatever you were doing when you saw him and go and sit next to him to hear him talk. He always had something surprising to say—something new and fresh and unexpected. He might speak of Oriental art of which he was a connoisseur—having, himself, an extensive collection. Or he would tell you about his experiments in cross-breeding delphinium at his summer place in Maine or the raising of oriental pheasants there and training them to survive a tough Maine winter. Or he would talk about Russia in which he had been born and which he had left early in life. He was immensely interested in the Soviet experiment and was aware, more than most of us, of the advances the Russians were making.

He was educated in Germany, where he studied law, economics, and philosophy. He took his Ph.D. degree at Halle in 1898. Throughout his career in education he was a brilliant representative of the European scholarly tradition. This seems to have been a reason for his appeal to so many American students who had begun their education under the rigid rules and arithmetical credit system which we may hope will eventually disappear from our schools.

He came to the United States soon after completing his studies in Germany and became a professor at Columbia in 1904. As a member of the University's first graduate faculty he belonged to a group that included John Dewey, Franz Boaz, James Harvey Robinson, Charles Beard, and Wesley Mitchell. Though his subject was economic history he would branch out in his lectures on all sorts of by-paths. He had some highly provocative theories, one of which was that the fall of Rome was due to agricultural loss. His book Hay and History in which he demonstrates this had a wide acceptance and it certainly makes fascinating reading. He often told the story that the printer did not believe the title and insisted on printing it "John Hay and History."

To Simkhovitch, education was not a process through which teachers propelled their students. Half the job—or more—came with the student's initiative. That was a reason that he advocated, especially for graduate students, freedom from regulations and special requirements—freedom, as an associate puts it "to pick flowers from the wayside, to explore interesting by-paths, to dig into fundamentals on their own responsibility instead of being led along well-beaten routes."

A characteristic story is told by a Centurion who was one of Professor Simkhovitch's students: "He was the last of the faculty members who was present when I got my Ph.D. When it came to his turn to ask questions, he delivered me a long lecture on Russia and Socialism and then said he was satisfied with my qualifications, for which, of course, I loved him."

Simkhovitch was especially fond of the Century. He was a familiar figure both in the East Room and at the Long Table. He was a member for fifty-two years.

Sidney Earle Smith

Higher education in Canada took a long stride forward as a result of the dedicated effort of Sidney Smith. The pressure of fund raising, so general in these times on university presidents, never seems to have diverted him from his warm, intense interest in the individual student. Concepts of mass education were quite alien to him. That he was able to conserve his beliefs in the face of the inundation of students and the rocketing educational costs of postwar years suggests the measure of his special dedication.

His career began when he was made dean of law at Dalhousie University in Halifax in 1929. "He came," a colleague tells, "like a breath of fresh air into that rather venerable institution and the somewhat stodgy and sleepy city of Halifax. He was bursting with vigor of youth, full of fun and warm friendship, enthusiastic in the pursuit of knowledge and an inspiring teacher to prospective lawyers." Five years later, he became president of the University of Manitoba. He was then thirty-seven, the youngest university president in Canada.

Manitoba at this time has been described as a "financial and administrative morass"—a victim of the depression. In his decade of strenuous work here, he restored its stability through sound administration of funds and built its academic standing to a new peak. His philosophy of education discriminated sharply between grades of intelligence and character among the students in opposition to the equality concept held by some educators in the United States. "The ideal," he said, "of one man's being as good as another has been done to death," and he hoped that more snobs would enter Manitoba. "Not social snobs," he explained, "but snobs with a sense of responsibility." Great leaders were this kind of snobs. "They are conscious of belonging to a class and won't let it down."

In 1945 he reached the high point of his profession with the presidency of the University of Toronto, the largest educational institution in Canada and then about to enter its greatest period of expansion. In spite of this rapid growth, however, President Smith firmly maintained the pattern of a federation of small colleges, and he encouraged in each of these the small-college atmosphere. He found that there had been undue emphasis at Toronto on technical and vocational training; he fought this and brought about a proper balance with the humanities.

At the age of sixty he entered public life. He was then appointed Secretary of State for External Affairs. This was in 1957 and he served in that post until his death. He died on the eve of the arrival in Ottawa of Prime Minister Macmillan.

Sidney Smith was born in Port Hood, Cape Breton Island, in 1897, the son of a farmer father and a schoolteacher mother. His education began at Port Hood Academy and King's College in Halifax. It was interrupted by the First World War, in which he served as a gunner in a Canadian siege battery. Later he graduated with honors from Dalhousie and from Harvard.

In June, 1958, he received the degree of Doctor of Laws from Columbia University. He was cited as "scholar of the law, eloquent advocate of liberal education and distinguished man of government."

Theodore Spicer-Simson

Though English-born, Theodore Spicer-Simson spent most of his life in the United States and in France. He was a sculptor of portrait medallions. He took special pleasure in portraying bearded heads; he had great feeling for the decorative use of beards. In England George Bernard Shaw, Robert Bridges, and "A.E.," offered scope for this, and his portraits of these men are among his best, but he also did some fine medallions of Thomas Hardy and Winston Churchill. His American subjects included Dreiser, Mencken, Elinor Wylie, Hervey Allen, Padraic Colum, and Van Wyck Brooks.

From his earliest youth Spicer-Simson knew precisely what he wanted to do in his life, and nothing could divert him from it. His parents tried to induce him to be a military officer and, when he refused, put him into his father's brokerage firm in Le Havre, France. There, instead of keeping the books, he spent his time making sketches of the other clerks or of ships in the harbor.

He was a brave young man as well as a determined one—brave enough to ride one of those monstrous old-fashioned bicycles with the enormous wheel in front and the tiny one behind. One day this dangerous sport nearly ended his career when he lost control of the monster on a steep hill. He slid off behind and grabbed the frame of the bicycle which dragged him down the hill on his stomach. His only thought in these gruelling moments was: "Now, perhaps, I'll never be an artist."

Later, when he was doing his portrait-medallion of Thomas Hardy, he made it clear that there would be no flattering compromise. "Mr. Hardy," he said at the first sitting, "I want you to know that I am making this portrait to please myself." Hardy jumped up and put his hand on the young sculptor's shoulder. "That," he said, "is precisely why I write my poems."

A book published in England, entitled "Men of Letters of the British Isles," presented the English collection of his portrait-medallions, but no American collection was published. Two of the American portraits, however, were used as frontispieces. One was the head of Gamaliel Bradford in the volume of Bradford's letters; the other, of Centurion Van Wyck Brooks, was the frontispiece of Brooks's Days of the Phoenix.

Spicer-Simson had, for many years, a studio in Paris and lived in the village of Bourron, near Fontainebleau. During the German occupation he was put in an internment camp but was let out when his health failed. He also had a bungalow at Coconut Grove in Florida, and it was there that he died.

He received awards for his work from the National Sculpture Society and from the Numismatic Museum. He was a member of the Century for forty years and exhibited in the Art Gallery in the 1920's.

Eliot Tuckerman

Eliot could trace his American ancestry to 1630 and he was proud of the Yankee family through which he was descended. His views were so conservative that even some of his rightist Republican friends stopped short of his position. He was nostalgic for the old ways which he believed had been defeated by the loose thinking and ethics of the modern world. He never hesitated to express his beliefs no matter what company he was in, and his companions sometimes thought him too emphatic.

But many of our best citizens, including, of course, Centurions, heartily agreed with him in his indignation about national Prohibition. He was firmly convinced that the 18th Amendment was proposed in defiance of constitutional rule. Actually, the amendment was submitted to the states by the vote of two-thirds of the members of each house who were in attendance at the time. But Tuckerman maintained that the vote should be by two-thirds of the whole number of Senators and Representatives and he cited a letter by Gouverneur Morris, one of the Constitution's signers, as evidence of the correctness of his view. In 1927 he filed a brief to this effect in the Supreme Court.

Born in New York in 1872, he graduated from Harvard College in 1894 and took his law degree at the Harvard Law School in 1898. After serving as private secretary to Joseph H. Choate, he entered the offices of Evarts, Choate and Beaman. When his apprenticeship there was completed, he practiced on his own, specializing in estate law. He was considered an expert on constitutional law.

In 1914, soon after the outbreak in Europe of the First World War, he went to England on a warship as custodian of a gold shipment from J. P. Morgan and Company to the British government.

In 1918 he was elected to the New York State Assembly from the tenth district. As a Republican he took an active interest in politics and public affairs. He wrote frequent letters to the newspapers; his correspondence included many diatribes against President Franklin Roosevelt and the New Deal.

At his death Tuckerman was eighty-seven. He had been a Centurion since 1911.

Victor Morris Tyler

For a dozen or so years there were no more familiar figures at the Century than the Tyler brothers, Ernest and Victor. Many Centurions were greatly saddened by Ernest's death in 1951, but Victor has stayed on with us, to delight us with his stories and anecdotes and his sympathetic companionship. No one could tell a shaggy dog story better than he, and no one laughed more exuberantly at his own tales—a peculiarly infectious habit that sometimes filled a room with gaiety. Now Victor is gone, too, and only memories are left, but they are good ones.

The Tyler family were connected with the beginnings of the American telephone. Morris F. Tyler, father of Ernest and Victor, was the New Haven lawyer who drew up the first incorporation papers of the District Telephone Company of New Haven. In 1883, only seven years after the telephone was invented, Morris Tyler became the head of The Southern New England Telephone Company.

Victor was born in 1875 and was graduated from Yale in 1898. For two years he was his father's personal secretary. In 1901 he was elected secretary of his father's company; then, on his father's death in 1907, he succeeded him as director of The Southern New England Telephone Company, a post he held for more than fifty years.

In 1957 Victor published his personal memoirs in a book entitled Connecticut Telephony. In the Foreword to this book, its editor has written: "No man now living has Victor Tyler's intimate knowledge of the early years of telephony in Connecticut—both as a participant and through association with his father. These memoirs should give most readers, as they did me, a real sense of re-living the trying, pioneering events which formed the sound base for a large, modern corporation."

A Centurion associate says: "Victor Tyler was one of the finest gentlemen I have ever known. Blessed with a keen mind, an excellent sense of humor, and a deep understanding of his fellow men, he added immeasurably to any occasion or enterprise in which he took part."

James Carey Warren

Jim Warren had been a Centurion for only four years when death took him away at an age that is most rewarding for many of us. But the Century meant much to him. He came to most of the monthly meetings and, especially, to the concerts, for music was his favorite art though he was an amateur of them all.

While his vocation was investment banking, his tastes lay widely outside that circle. He had a fine gift of appreciation for painting, sculpture, and the ballet; in music he added performance to understanding. In singing he followed in the tradition of that "Century's immortal" Frank Rogers. He was an ardent promoter of glee clubs, he was a member of the University Glee Club in New York for fifteen years, and he sang also in the Schola Cantorum and in the Blue Hill Troupe.

Warren was born in Cleveland in 1896. His father was for many years head of the Romance Language Department at Yale, and Jim's boyhood was spent in New Haven. He graduated from Amherst with the class of 1919. It was in college that his musical activities began, but his active participation in glee club events did not prevent him from becoming a member of Phi Beta Kappa and graduating magna cum laude. In the First World War he enlisted in the army and was at the Field Artillery School in Louisville when the war ended.

He then entered the firm of Lee, Higginson and Company and later became a partner in A. M. Kidder and Company of New York. Here he was in charge of underwriting and syndicates from 1942 to 1956. He was a director of the American Maracaibo Petroleum Company and vice-president and trustee of Knickerbocker Hospital in New York.

The cancer that overtook Jim Warren on a vacation in Spain brought death quickly, and he was spared a session of acute pain. He died at sixty-two.

Roger Williams

"It is entirely filled," said Roger Williams of the Century, "with stuffy old men." Saying this, he resigned. A dozen or so years later a member who knew him and knew that he was a natural Centurion invited him to the Club for lunch at the Long Table. It was obvious that Williams was having a good time, so the member asked him if he still thought the Century was full of stuffy old men. "Why, no," answered Williams; "they all seem to be young men of my own age now." After that it took little persuasion to convince Williams to ask for reinstatement. He became greatly attached to the Century and spent many hours in the library, driven by his constantly inquiring mind. It was his custom when he heard a question asked in the course of a conversation at lunch to spend the afternoon running down the answer.

Roger Williams's career was largely concerned with ships. When he retired he was executive vice-president of the Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company. This position followed a long experience with naval vessels, merchantmen, and yachts.

He was born in Chatham Center, New York. At nineteen he saw naval action in the Spanish-American War. After graduating from the Naval Academy in 1901, he served first on the battleship Illinois, then as commander of the presidential yacht Sylph in the administrations of Theodore Roosevelt and Taft. In the First World War he commanded the destroyer Duncan in the Queenstown Patrol. In his crew were Centurions Junius S. Morgan and Charles Curtis. Later he served as naval aide to General of the Armies John J. Pershing. He was awarded the Navy Cross.

After his resignation in 1920 he became operating manager in New York of the International Merchant Marine, but he did not confine his work to New York. At Newport News he supervised the building of three Panama Pacific liners. His appointment as director of the Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company came in 1930, and in the same year he was elected vice-president of the National Council of American Shipbuilders, an office which he continued to hold through annual re-election. He was also honorary vice-president of the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers and president of the board of trustees of the Mariner's Museum.

A Centurion who saw him often in his last illness reports that Williams inquired constantly about the Club. "I only hope," he said, "that the doctors will get me well enough so that I will be able to go down a few times a week to sit at the Round Table and listen to the conversation at cocktail time again."

Edwin Garvin Zabriskie

Is there an affinity between medicine and music? It is arresting to find so many music lovers and indeed, interpreters of music among doctors. A striking example was Edwin Zabriskie whose performance with the violin and viola was a counterpoint to his difficult, delicate work in neuropsychiatry. He also maintained a string quartet which performed on many a winter evening at his home. He took part, too, in the musical and dramatic events of the Bohemian Club of San Francisco. It was said of him that he was a humanist as well as a physician, a romanticist in the best sense of the word and an inspiring teacher.

Third in a line of physicians, Edwin Zabriskie was born in 1874. He was educated first at the Erasmus Private Academy in Brooklyn, then at Columbia and at the Long Island College Hospital, from which he received his doctor's degree in 1897 at the age of twenty-three. He served his internship at Kings County Hospital. Then, still restless for education, he studied neurology in the University of Berlin and in Paris.

Upon his return he was appointed adjunct professor of neurology at the New York Post-Graduate Medical School. Soon after the Neurological Institute of New York was founded, he joined its staff and eventually became its acting director. He was professor of clinical neurology at the College of Physicians and Surgeons from 1925 until his retirement in 1948 when he became professor emeritus in the college and consulting neurologist to the Presbyterian Hospital.

In the First World War he served in the Army Medical Corps and was a pioneer in the treatment of war-inflicted nervous disorders. This work took him through the battles of Chateau-Thierry and the Marne and the Meuse-Argonne campaign. He was cited by the Fifth Army Corps. He was discharged in 1919 with the rank of lieutenant colonel. In the Second World War he was consultant to the United States Surgeon General and was an examiner in neurology and psychiatry at the induction board. For his services, President Truman bestowed upon him a Certificate of Appreciation.

Doctor Zabriskie was a founder of the American Board of Psychiatry and Neurology, a Fellow of the American Psychiatric Association, and consultant to many hospitals in the New York metropolitan area. In 1947 he was awarded the Alumni Medallion of the Long Island College of Medicine for his fifty years of distinguished service to American medicine.

A Centurion colleague of Edwin Zabriskie writes: "He was always charming, witty and wise. Aside from his great professional skill, one of his greatest attributes was his uncanny ability to judge men—often before they could judge themselves." Could any tribute be more apposite to a man whose daily task was to seek reasons for the vagaries of the human mind?
