

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

3 1761 01718175 1

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

THE LIFE AND LETTERS
OF
THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
FRIEDRICH MAX MÜLLER

Wells & Luntz

Wells & Luntz

F. Max Müller.

Aged 46

THE LIFE AND LETTERS

OF

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

FRIEDRICH MAX MÜLLER

EDITED BY HIS WIFE

‘Blessed is he who has found his work : let him ask no other blessedness’

CARLYLE

IN TWO VOLUMES: VOL. I

WITH PORTRAITS AND OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.

39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON

NEW YORK AND BOMBAY

1902

All rights reserved

PJ

64

M8 A 4

1902

v. 1

688058

13.11.58

DEDICATED TO THE BELOVED MEMORY OF A GREAT AND GOOD MAN

PREFACE

IT may be thought that the publication of these volumes is superfluous after the two works Auld Lang Syne and the Autobiography, written by Max Müller himself. But it seemed that something more was wanted to show the innermost character of the real man; for Auld Lang Syne gave recollections of his friends only, 'a small portion of the panorama of life that passed before' his eyes; and the Autobiography is but a fragment, bringing us little beyond the threshold of his career. The plan pursued throughout these volumes has been to let Max Müller's letters and the testimony of friends to his mind and character speak for themselves, whilst the whole is connected by a slight thread of necessary narrative. The selection from the letters has been made with a view to bring the man rather than the scholar before the world. His innumerable works, covering a period of nearly sixty years, have made known the scholar; the object of this book is to show 'the elevation of soul and enlargement of mental outlook which was revealed more and more as his life's work opened up before him'<sup>1</sup>—that work which he carried on to within ten days of his death.

It is a matter of regret that much valuable correspondence has been destroyed. In America no letters have been preserved to Emerson or Oliver

<sup>1</sup> Funeral Sermon.—Rev. H. J. Bidder.

Wendell Holmes, and only one to Lowell. In England the letters to Carlyle, Sellar, Froude, Sir A. Grant, and other intimate friends have been burnt. In Germany all to Humboldt are gone, and all except a few trifling notes to the brothers Curtius, to Carrière, Mommsen, and others. In France none have been found to Stanislas Julien, to Regnier, or Barthélemy-St.-Hilaire. From Italy, too, no letters have been recovered. The corresponding letters from these distinguished men show how much of deep interest to the public has been lost.

I here desire to express my grateful thanks to many friends and relatives who have helped me in my task, especially to Mrs. Rowland Corbet and Miss Mabel Peach, who have translated and copied innumerable letters for me; to the many known and unknown in all quarters of the globe who responded to my petition for letters; and I am also greatly indebted to Messrs. Hills and Saunders for the use of the Photographs which illustrate the work.

If at times I have found the labour almost beyond my powers, it has been a labour of love, bringing strength and solace to many lonely hours. As Mr. Mozoomdar writes to me, 'The most heavenly relation here is the relation between the living and the dear dead. We cannot draw them down to us, but they continually draw us to them.'

GEORGINA MAX MÜLLER.

IGHTHAM MOTE,
September, 1902.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I.

1823-1841.

PAGES

Parentage. Father's death. Dessau. Musical training. School.
Poetical tendencies. Nicolai School, Leipzig. Dr. Carus. Music.
Letters to his mother. Examination at Zerbst . . . . .	1-15

CHAPTER II.

1841-1844.

University life at Leipzig. Studies. Sanskrit. Friends. University life at Berlin. Hensels. Lectures. Hagedorn. Humboldt.
Bunsen . . . . .	16-29

CHAPTER III.

1845-1846.

Paris. Lonely, struggling life. Gathy. Burnouf. Rig-veda .
Rachel. Dvarikanath Tagore. Boehtlingk . . . . .	30-47

CHAPTER IV.

1846-1847.

London. W. H. Russell. Bunsen. Visit to Germany. East
India Company and the Rig-veda . British Association . . . . .	48-69

CHAPTER V.

1848.

Visit to Paris. Revolution. Settles at Oxford. Friends there.
Letters to Burnouf and Bunsen . . . . .	70-86

CHAPTER VI.

1849.

Death of sister's children. Froude. Visit to Lakes. Prix Volney.
Publication of first volume of Rig-veda . Carus. Visit to Germany . . . . .	87-105

CHAPTER VII.

1850-1851.

Dinner at Potsdam. Morier's illness. Return to Oxford. Rauch.
Waagen. Appointed to lecture at Oxford. Letters from Professors Cowell and Story-Maskelyne. Visit to Froude. Article in Edinburgh Review . Made Deputy Professor and Honorary
M.A. . . . .	106-128

CHAPTER VIII.

1852-1853.

PAGES

Member of Bavarian Academy. Summer in Germany. The George Butlers. Arrival and baptism of Dr. Aufrecht. Essay on Turanian Languages for Bunsen. Visit to Scotland. First meeting with future wife. Missionary Alphabet . . . . . 129-148

CHAPTER IX.

1854-1855.

Professor of Modern Languages. Second volume of Rig-veda. Death of Burnouf. Crimean War. Languages of the Seat of War. Bunsen's resignation. Nehemiah Goreh. Visit to Germany. Froude. Kingsley. Macaulay. Visit to Malvern. Indian Civil Service Examinations. Paris. Dresden. M.A. by decree. Renan . . . . . 149-174

CHAPTER X.

1856-1857.

Comparative Mythology. Commemoration. His mother in England. Vol. III of Rig-veda. Curator of Bodleian. Christmas at Glasgow. Deutsche Liebe. Buddhist Pilgrims. Examination at Exeter. Visit to Froude. Germany. Manchester Exhibition . . . 175-203

CHAPTER XI.

1858-1859.

Letters of Philindus. Canterbury. German Classics. Fellow of All Souls. Jenny Lind. Birmingham Festival. Correspondent of French Institute. Death of Manuel Johnson. Ancient Sanskrit Literature. Marriage. Germany. Life at Oxford. Mother's illness. Correspondent of Turin Academy . . . . . 204-230

CHAPTER XII.

1860-1861.

Mother's illness. Death of Wilson. Move to High Street. Sanskrit election. Birth of first child. Wife's illness. Spring at Ray Lodge. Lectures on the 'Science of Language.' Visit from his mother. Death of Prince Consort . . . . . 231-257

CHAPTER XIII

1862-1863.

PAGES

Birth of second child. Exhibition. Stay in London. Ewald. Ranke. Fourth volume of Rig-veda. Second course of lectures on 'Science of Language.' Paris. Germany. North Italy. Lectures at Edinburgh. First visit to Windsor . . . . . 258-286

CHAPTER XIV.

1864-1865.

Lectures at Osborne. Schleswig-Holstein war. Birth of third child. Member of Royal Irish Academy. Weymouth. Visit of his mother. Lecture at Leeds. Member of Turin Academy. Last visit to Ray Lodge. Sub-Librarianship of Bodleian . . . . . 287-313

CHAPTER XV.

1866-1867.

Easter in Paris. Sanskrit Grammar. War between Prussia and Austria. Cornwall. 'My Brother.' Gold medal from Duke of Anhalt. Illness. Bournemouth. Letter on Brahma Somâj. Death of niece. 'Parks End' bought. Cure at Ems. Chips, Vols. I and II . . . . . 314-343

CHAPTER XVI.

1868-1869.

Death of sister. Visit of mother. Letter to Duke of Argyll. LL.D. at Cambridge. Professorship of Comparative Philology. Visits to Frogmore, Fulham, and Gloucester. Isle of Wight. Tennyson. Illness of children. Member of French Institute. Translations from the Vedic Hymns, Vol. I. Soden. Kiel. Denmark . 344-371

CHAPTER XVII.

1870.

Lectures on the 'Science of Religion.' Keshub Chunder Sen. Franco-German War. LL.D. at Edinburgh. Letters to Dean Stanley. To 'the English People.' Work for sick and wounded. North Wales. Letters to Dr. Abeken and Mr. Gladstone. Chips, Vol. III . . . . . 372-402

CHAPTER XVIII.

1871.

King of Burma. Correspondence with Abeken and Gladstone. Taine's Lectures. Peace Festival. Letter from Crown Prince. Death of father-in-law. Ems. Interviews with Emperor and Crown Prince. Dr. Stainer. New edition of Lectures on Language . . . . . 403-425

CHAPTER XIX.

1872.

PAGES

Memorial to Bishop Patteson. Offer of Professorship at Strassburg.
Rig-veda , Vol. V. Death of sister-in-law. Strassburg. Baden.
Munich. Life of Stockmar . Switzerland. Dr. Stanley Select Preacher. Freiligrath's poem . . . . .	426-443

CHAPTER XX.

1873-1874.

German University finances. Strassburg Professorship declined.
Schliemann. Lectures on Darwin's Philosophy of Language .
Emerson. Veddahs. Cromer. Lecture in Westminster Abbey.
Order pour le Mérite. Member of Hungarian Academy. Prince and Princess of Roumania. Oriental Congress. Last volume of
Rig-veda . American attack on Max Müller . . . . .	444-474

CHAPTER XXI.

1875.

Death of Charles Kingsley. Visit to Italy. Windsor. Last visit of mother. Chips , Vol. IV. The Mumbles. Manchester. Plans for return to Germany. Maximilian Order. Oxford Girls' High School . . . . .	475-505

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

PORTRAIT OF F. MAX MÜLLER, AGED 40 . . . . .	Frontispiece
(From a Photograph by Hills &amp; Saunders, Oxford)
NO. 7, NORHAM GARDENS, OXFORD . . . . .	To face p. 335
(From a Photograph by Hills &amp; Saunders, Oxford)
F. MAX MÜLLER, AGED 50 . . . . .	„ „ 453
(From a Medallion by Bruce Joy)

CHAPTER I

1823-1841

Parentage. Father's death. Dessau. Musical training. School.
Poetical tendencies. Nicolai School, Leipzig. Dr. Carus. Music.
Letters to his mother. Examination at Zerbst.

FRIEDRICH MAX MÜLLER was born at Dessau, the capital of the Duchy of Anhalt Dessau, on December 6, 1823. His father was the popular lyric poet, Wilhelm Müller, Librarian to the Duke of Dessau, and master at the Gymnasium (chief school) in that place; a man of great cultivation, of most genial disposition, a general favourite, keenly alive to the enjoyments of life, in every way of noble and forcible character.

Max Müller's mother was Adelheid, elder daughter of President von Basedow, Prime Minister of the Duchy of Dessau. She was very small, but very beautiful, clever and lively, and had a fine contralto voice; and it was from her that Max Müller inherited his intense love of music. Frau Hofrätthin Müller was a highly cultivated woman, understanding English, French, and Italian perfectly. She was a woman of an eager, even passionate temperament, and her children evidently suffered early from this, as Wilhelm Müller's letters are full of warnings to her not to punish too severely, and not to expect too much from her children (babies of four and five when their father died). Her father, President von Basedow, was himself the son of a man famous in Germany in his day, the pedagogue Basedow, the forerunner of Pestalozzi and Fröbel.

Friedrich Max was named after his mother's elder brother, who later on succeeded his own father as President of the Duchy, and after Max in the Freischütz, an opera which had then just appeared ; Carl Maria von Weber being an intimate friend of his parents and Max's godfather. Soon after he finally settled in England he used Max as part of his surname, Müller alone, as he always said, being as distinctive a name as Smith without any prefix in England. His only sister was nearly two years older than himself, and he never had any brother. Max Müller had but a vague memory of his first home, the Librarian's house in Dessau, with its pretty garden—a memory founded more on visits to the house in subsequent years than on any clear remembrance of his life there. His recollections of his father, too, were very dim, as he was not quite four at the time of his death. Such as they were they are recorded in the Autobiography.

'Wilhelm Müller's life in Dessau was a very happy one,' wrote his friend, the poet Gustav Schwab ; 'he was valued by his Duke and Duchess . . . devotedly loved by his pupils, and a favourite with all who had once recognized his character and nature ; he had a clever, attractive wife, and healthy, handsome children, to whom he was a most devoted father, and with whom he would play for hours like a merry child himself.' Though only thirty-three when he died, he had achieved a considerable amount of work, and evidently possessed the power of working rapidly, a power inherited by his son. The end to this happy life came with frightful suddenness. Wilhelm Müller had been to Oranienbaum, a park near Dessau, to see the Duke, and returned late, in high spirits. In the night his young wife woke to find him dead by her side ! The awful shock is supposed to have brought on the deafness from which she soon began to suffer, and which became total many years before her death. Adelheid Müller, who had only a small pension as the widow of a civil servant, went for a time with her two children to live in her father's house, the house she had left but a few years before as a brilliant, happy bride.

But Wilhelm Müller's widow had not been forgotten by his friend and patron, and shortly after his death she received the following letter from the Duke of Dessau :—

Translation.

‘Whilst I wish again to express my sincere sympathy in the great loss you have sustained, I am anxious in some degree to lessen the cares which the education of your children must bring, and I therefore grant you, as long as you remain a widow, the yearly sum of 100 thalers<sup>1</sup> till your son has completed his twenty-first year, and then for your life the sum of fifty thalers, to begin from the first of this month. I beg to assure you of the continuance of my true esteem.

LEOPOLD.

‘Nov. 30, 1827.’

Max Müller tells us in his Autobiography of the gloom cast over his whole childhood by his father’s death. Happily he had inherited much of that father’s joyous temperament, so that the almost daily visits to the grave ‘where the young mother stood and sobbed and cried’ whilst her two children looked on, had less effect on him than might be expected; and the constant intercourse with various friends and relations brightened what would otherwise have been a time of dark memory for his whole life. The few left who remember those early days agree in describing Max Müller as brimful of fun and mischief, and his mother’s old servant Hanna, who lived to a great age and was never tired of asking for news of her former torment, used in those early days to call him Dieser infame Funge, ‘this terrible boy.’

After some years, Hofrätthin Müller left her father’s home and settled herself and her two children on the ground floor of a very small house. This house, though altered and improved, is still standing, a type of the old style of Dessau houses, consisting of a ground floor and one story above, with a loft under the high-pitched brown roof. The house looks into the churchyard of the Johannis Kirche, the church mentioned in Deutsche Liebe, where the effect of the Easter hymn on the musical child is so vividly described:—

Translation.

‘On this Easter Day . . . the old church, with its grey slate roof, and the high windows, and the tower with the golden cross, shone with marvellous brightness. Suddenly the light which streamed through the high windows began to wave and seem alive. But it was far too bright to look at; and as I shut my eyes, the light still came into my soul, and everything seemed to shine and be fragrant, and to sing and sound. I felt as if a new life began in me, as if I had become another being—and when I asked my mother what it was, she said it was an Easter hymn, which they were singing in the church. I have never been able to discover what was the pure holy song which then sank into my soul. . . . I have never heard it again. But now when I hear an adagio of Beethoven, or a psalm of Marcello, or a chorus of Händel . . . I feel as if the lofty church windows were again sparkling, as if the organ notes rang through my soul and a new world opened to me.'

<sup>1</sup> £15.

It is needless to repeat all that Max Müller has told us in Auld Lang Syne and the Autobiography of the life at Dessau, and the appearance of the little Residenz-Stadt (capital) at that time, still walled in, and with gates shut every night, its night watchman, and the oil lamps swinging across the streets. The night watchman and the oil lamps existed till late in the century. And yet with these primitive arrangements and simple life the little town was a centre of intellectual interest and cultivation. Music, such as one hears now only in a great capital; a first-rate theatre, as far as the acting and opera were concerned; real intellectual society, which hardly exists in our hurried modern life—were all to be found at Dessau, and enjoyed at so modest a cost that they were within reach of all.

Those who remember Max Müller's pianoforte playing when he first came to England will not be surprised to hear that his musical training began very early, and before he went to any school. A young musician who lived next door taught him to play, as a surprise to his mother. They had made friends over the hedge that divided their gardens, and after the musician had discovered the little fellow's genuine love of music he lifted him daily over the hedge, and gave him his lesson. For months the child kept the secret, till at last one day he sat down before several friends and played his first piece. There are easy sonatas of Beethoven with his name on them and the date, showing that he was only six years old when he learnt them. At fourteen he played brilliantly, and took part in concerts at Dessau and Leipzig, and when at home for the holidays was often sent for by the Duchess of Dessau, who was herself a fine musician, to play duets with her on the piano. Whilst still quite a child he was invited to any good music that was given in Dessau. One note written by a Dr. Otta, about the year 1831, runs thus:—

Translation.

‘In the hopes of giving you pleasure, I take the liberty of inviting you to hear the quintette to be played to-night at my house. I trust your mother will kindly give you permission.’

The note is addressed to—

The distinguished Musician

Master Max Müller.

When Max was only six years old Mendelssohn visited Dessau, and taking the child into the large church set him on his lap at the organ and made him play the keys, whilst he himself managed the pedals, which the little boy could not reach.

Many of Wilhelm Müller’s old friends took an interest in his lively attractive boy.

There is a charming letter dated Saturday, July 31, 1830, from M. Gathy, to whose friendship Max Müller owed a good deal in later years in Paris:—

Translation.

‘As I could not, my good Max, have you, as I wished, last Sunday for a long visit, I keep you to your promise and invite you and your dear little sister to have breakfast with me to-morrow at half-past eight, hoping that you will both receive permission to do so. If you paid me a visit in Hamburg, I could show you many beautiful things—toys of every sort, and particularly the most beautiful coloured tin soldiers, which would delight you. But I have left them all at home, and the hobby-horse and dolls and toys I have here would not amuse you. Toys are delightful—are they not, Max?—when one receives them from one’s loved parents; but other things, that one must be busy with, for other reasons, when one is older, are not nearly so pretty, or so nice to play with. Besides my brave tin soldiers, I had three beautiful collections of pictures, and flowers and butterflies. But one cannot always keep, my good Max, what one has, and, alas! everything does not last as one would wish. Everything is perishable, everything changes, and that is a great pity. Now, I still have all the pictures. I carry them about with me, yet I cannot show them to you; but the flowers are all withered, and mostly turned to dust, and my lovely coloured butterflies turn at last into crickets<sup>1</sup>, which do not look so pretty or so pleasant. So it is with my toys, my good Max. But it does not matter; I will be like my little soldiers, which were always my greatest delight. They stood up firmly, without knowing why, and let themselves be seized and pushed about on every side, and fought bravely and never complained. And when evening came they were gathered together and placed quietly in the dark cupboard, and there was peace. But don't be frightened, Max: come here and bring your fine sword with you; we will play and talk with each other, and from the window nod to your dear mother, as I always like to do, as she goes by to church, to pray the good God that you may always be a courteous, kind, good boy, and learn diligently and thrive to your own good, and her pleasure. Adieu, dear Max; you are expected then by your friend

GATHY.'

It is doubtful whether, inborn poet as he was, Max Müller could at six and a half have understood the beauty and pathos of this letter from the little deformed Jew.

Max entered the Gymnasium or High School at Dessau at six years old, and remained there till he was past twelve. His school reports were not remarkable, and certainly at that time he gave little evidence of the power that was in him. 'Writing bad' was the almost invariable report, and in later years he often lamented the small pains taken by the writing-master to improve it. An old schoolfellow, still living at Dessau, writes that all the other boys considered him a clever boy. 'He was full of life and much loved by all his schoolfellows.'

To our ideas the life led by the little Max was one of considerable hardship. Thinly clad and poorly fed, not from want of care and love, but from sheer poverty, his breath in winter frozen into a sheet of ice on his bed from the absence of fire, suffering from constant headaches, which may have originated from want of full nourishment such as a growing child needs, and yet nothing seems to have clouded his naturally sunny, joyous temperament. He tells us: 'As a little boy, when I could not have the same toys which other boys possessed I could fully enjoy what they enjoyed, as if they had been my own. It was not the result of teaching, still less of reasoning—it was a sentiment given me, and which certainly did not leave me till much later in life.’

<sup>1</sup> A play on the word Grillen, which means crickets, and worries.

He remembered how constantly he was enjoined to take care of his clothes and make them last: and when he and his sister returned from school the boots that cost so much were put away and replaced by shoes made for them by the careful mother. It was this frugal training, this life of constant self-denial and careful thought for every trifle, that gave Max Müller in after life the feeling of thankfulness, and the power of rejoicing in every little luxury and pleasure which he could afford himself. To the very last ‘the child’s pure delight in little things’ gave a constant zest to his life, and made it easy for others to give him pleasure. Through his whole life he took every good thing, every honour that he received, as a gift he had not deserved. Some of his critics, who never knew him personally, speak of his vanity, because he dwelt with pleasure and gratitude on the honours and successes that came to him in later life. Any really vain man would have shrunk from showing his enjoyment of the good things that fell to him, for fear of being thought vain. One who knew him well mentions his entire freedom from vanity as a prominent point in his character. There is a mock humility more akin to vanity than the grateful rejoicing in all blessings (his own talents included) which was a characteristic of Max Müller’s whole life. It is true that he greatly valued and even desired the love and approbation so largely accorded him, but this arose from his loving nature, which craved for sympathy, and not from vanity.

One more glimpse is given us of the early life in a letter from his von Basedow grandmother. His mother had gone in the early summer of 1835 with some friends to Heligoland; and she took her daughter with her, leaving Max at his grandfather’s to go to his school. The Frau Präsident writes to her absent daughter:—

Translation.

‘6 a.m. MY DEAR ADELHEID,—The father is out riding, Max is having his music lesson, Julie is still asleep, and I am sitting in the garden, in the summer-house, where we breakfast every morning. I think that I cannot employ my time better than in writing to you, to give you an account of us all, for Max now belongs to us. We are all, down to the youngest, quite well, thank God. Max is very good and diligent, and has given no occasion for punishment. He bathes regularly, either with Fritz or our servant, but never alone. I am much too nervous to allow that. Just now he goes with Julie, who bathes every other day in the Mulde. We shall miss him very much when he leaves us, he has become quite one of us. You would be amused if you saw him smoking a pipe with his grandfather. He can also take a pinch of snuff, and he does not refuse a taste of liqueur. The father has a very quiet horse on which he can ride alone, so you will find him quite a grown-up man in all the finer arts. His trousers indeed have a very variegated appearance from cherries, bilberries, and ink, but a young man does not think much of that.'

We have spoken of Max Müller as an inborn poet, and in later life he told a friend he had all his life tried not to be a poet. From the early age of nine he began to write verses, all of which were carefully kept by his devoted mother. They are verses written for Christmas, or family birthdays, but one on the beautiful God's Acre at Dessau attempts a higher flight.

'It is a beautiful and restful place,' he says in the Autobiography, 'covered with old acacia trees.' It was probably this association that gave Max Müller a peculiar love for acacia trees, and it was a real grief to him when one that stood in the Parks close to his house in Norham Gardens withered and died. He tells us that the inscription over the gateway of the God's Acre was a puzzle to his young mind: 'Death is not death, 'tis but the ennobling of man's nature.' It may have been the echo of these words in his mind that made him in 1884, in writing to one of his Buddhist pupils, speak of 'looking forward to a better life—I mean a life in which we shall be better.' When at school at Leipzig he constantly wrote poems in the letters he sent his mother, and there were three occasions at his school at Leipzig where he had to recite publicly verses of his own writing. There is a whole book full of manuscript sonnets and poems written during his University career, some of which were published at the time in journals and papers, and brought in a little money, most acceptable to the poor student. During the hard battle with life in Paris and London, the muse seems to have been silent. A few beautiful sonnets exist, written later under the pressure of great sorrow, but his life was too full of other work, to which he was pledged to devote his time, for him to indulge in poetry, and except two sonnets to the Emperor Frederick (1871 and 1888), and an ode on the death of the Duke of Albany, nothing exists written in later years but a few birthday couplets. Max Müller never published any of his poems, except in his University days.

After his grandfather's death Max was sent, at Easter, 1836, to the famous Nicolai School at Leipzig. He lived in the house of Dr. Carus, an old family friend, whose only son, Victor, was of the same age. 'Max was taken as a friend,' writes Professor Victor Carus, 'and was treated entirely as a son of the family. Aunt Müller, as his mother was called by all of us, never paid anything, as my parents were intimate friends of hers. We went together to the Nicolai School, we slept in the same room, worked together, and had, in fact, everything in common.' Max was placed in Quarta, which answers to Remove at Eton. The education was almost entirely classical, and before he left the school, five years later, he could speak Latin with perfect ease. He was able to hear a great deal of good music at Leipzig, Frau Carus herself being very musical, with a fine voice, and she and Dr. Carus delighted in collecting the best musicians at their house. Victor Carus was a good violinist, and when the two young friends, Victor and Max, were about fifteen years old, they astonished Dr. Carus on his birthday by playing the whole Kreutzer Sonata by heart.

There had long been an intimate friendship between the Mendelssohns and Max Müller's parents, therefore he naturally saw much of Felix Mendelssohn, who was conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig from 1835 to 1843. He thus describes his first musical evening to his mother :—

Translation.

'I went on Friday to Mendelssohn's, and already on the staircase heard the lovely music. I went in bravely<sup>1</sup>, and was received in the most friendly manner. I found Felix, David, Dreischock, and Mendelssohn's sister Fanny. Hensel was very kind, so was she; both spoke of you, and Hensel of my father too, whom he admired immensely. Mendelssohn stood close to the piano, and I sat where I could watch Dreischock with great comfort. He is still the first of pianists, and quite a young man. He played here last winter and was taken for Thalberg. He played really marvellously, so that Mendelssohn wondered at his skill, though he (Felix) immediately afterwards played an imitation of his composition. I must say, I much prefer Mendelssohn, even if the other has more skill, particularly in octave playing, in which he is decidedly the first of artists. Then Hensel told me a delightful story. They had already last Wednesday sent here for me, but Sophie did not understand the maid, and sent her to Dr. Müller, who lives behind this in the Garden house. And so he went in the evening, beautifully got up, and nobody knew him, or what to say to him. That was funny.'

<sup>1</sup> He was little over thirteen.

Later, he writes thus of Thalberg:—

Translation.

'Now I have seen and heard Thalberg. It was yesterday evening. It is indescribable. I am still perfectly enchanted by it; there can be nothing else like it. He is quite young, handsome, and very distinguished looking, beautiful hands and such skill, execution, and power.'

From the time he went to Leipzig, Max Müller began the correspondence with his passionately loved mother, which continued till the year of her death, 1883. Almost every letter has been kept, and the whole forms a complete journal of his doings when not with her. With his ardent affection for her, he felt the separation keenly, and writes on the first birthday on which he was not with her, as follows:—

Translation.

Oct. 10, 1836.

'MY DEAR GOOD MOTHER,—To-day, for the first time, I have to be far away from you on your birthday, and you can fancy how sorry I am. I think it grieves you too, little mother, for I know your love for me. Oh, how I long to be with you, only for a moment, only to press you in my arms, only to tell you how I love you: but it can't be. Your birthday is always doubly dear to me, first because it is your birthday, and then because it was the first day that you roused yourself again from your sorrow<sup>1</sup>, to which just in these weeks of the year you gave way more than usually. You were right to grieve, and it would not have been proper to try to console and amuse you. You must have sorrowed this year more than usual, as the birthday of our good grandfather was this week. But I will not write more about this; it will but renew your sorrow. I will only say that God has replaced something of what you have lost, in giving you two beings who love you as no others do. You best know whom I mean.

<sup>1</sup> W. Müller died Oct. 1; her birthday was Oct. 12.

‘Your MAX.’

These early letters to his mother show a maturity of thought and earnestness of purpose that are very unusual in so young a boy; and as life went on the relations of mother and son seem changed, and it is the son who takes the guiding and protecting tone towards the mother.

In March, 1839, Dr. Carus lost his wife, who had watched over Max with the same motherly care she gave to her own boy. His grief at the time, and his later letters, prove how sorely he missed her. In one letter he gives his mother an account of his day, which would probably have been laid out more wisely had the kind Tante (aunt) been still there to watch over him.

Translation.

‘You will be surprised to hear that I have arranged everything for certain fixed hours, but I am very glad to have settled it so that I am not interrupted. I get up at five, or even earlier, and work till seven, go to school, play the violoncello at eleven, the piano at twelve, then dinner, then school again, then coffee and gymnastic exercises, then work again till I can get fresh air in the garden, which is impossible in this heat, during the day. I seem quite changed to myself, and you know that such punctual arrangements were not at all in my line. I eat only a roll from five in the morning till one o’clock, and drink no coffee early, and I often feel rather faint. Then for the last week I have had constant headaches, but I am getting quite accustomed to them, and I lead a very happy life.’

In the last years of his school life he seems to have read a good deal for himself, and discusses the books he reads with his mother.

Translation.

‘I had already said to myself that you would not be pleased that I had read Wilhelm Meister, and in some respects you are quite right; not that it can exactly hurt me, but that it might occupy my thoughts too much. On the evil influence of reading or other temptations, I could not point out any better passage than the Latin verse in Faust which Mephistopheles repeats to the student, that God is holy and good just because He knows what evil is. This is very true if only further explained, i. e. because He knows evil, but never commits it. If we could imagine that God did not know what sin and temptation are, we could not call Him God, for we should have an imperfect God. . . . The more dangerous things I read, the stronger I become, if I am not mistaken, to wage war with them. And yet again what you say is true, for how foolhardy it would be to throw oneself into temptations without thoroughly knowing oneself, and how far one could stand firm. So a desire for dangerous reading is in itself a crime.'

And again—

Translation.

'I have had a great deal of pleasure from Bettina von Arnim's letters and diary. It is full of beautiful feeling and well expressed, though towards the end it is weaker, for there it becomes laboured; at first it just bubbles up of its own accord.'

Though Max Müller tells us he had little chance of travelling during his school days, there is a journal of three days spent at Dresden and in a walking tour through Saxon Switzerland at Whitsuntide, 1839, when he was fifteen and a half years old. This visit gave him his first sight of really great works of art, for though there are some choice pieces of sculpture and a few good pictures at Dessau, the little capital naturally possesses nothing quite of the first rank. 'It was perfect enchantment,' he says, 'to step into the Raphael room, where the great Madonna standing on the globe shines down upon us, a picture that far exceeds all one's imagination, and stands there, the crown of all pictures.' The same feeling animated him in 1857, when he wrote in Deutsche Liebe: 'To stand before the Madonna di San Sisto in Dresden, and to allow all the thoughts to wake in us, which year after year the unfathomable look of the child has created in us.'

From reasons of economy he was not always able to spend his holidays at Dessau with his mother and sister, as we see from the following little note dated 'Silvester Evening,' that is December 31, probably 1839:—

Translation.

‘How often I wish that I were so far advanced that I could myself earn something to make your life easier—you who deprive yourself of everything and spare everything to make us happy. But I will try to be more and more diligent, and better, that, as far as I can, I may give you pleasure, which is the only possible return for all your love and care.’

Max Müller had to pass his abiturienten examination in the early spring of 1841 at Zerbst, in order to gain a Dessau scholarship for the University. This examination was more scientific than classical, but he passed easily, taking a first class, and gained his scholarship, such as it was—£6—a mere trifle to English ideas, but an important help to him. Before the examination, Dr. Nobbe, the head master of the Nicolai School, wrote thus of him to his mother :—

Translation.

‘I rejoice that I can see him leave this school with testimonials of moral excellence not often found in one of his years, possessed of knowledge first rate in more than one subject, and with intellectual capacities excellent throughout. May this young mind develop more and more, and may the fruits of his labours be hereafter a comfort to his mother for the sorrows and cares of the past.’

For months before leaving school, though only seventeen, the thought of the future weighed heavily on him, and he seems, almost to the time of entering the University, to have felt uncertain as to the special line of life he should adopt. Poor and without influence, it was necessary that he should be in a position to keep himself as soon as he left the University. The following letter shows how carefully he weighed and considered the question :—

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

‘I recognized blindly that a free, unfettered life is the best, but did not reflect sufficiently on the results that might arise. . . .

‘It would be indeed delightful, and my greatest wish, to be engaged actively as a philologist, and make a career at the University. But who can be certain that I shall distinguish myself? and where there is only mediocrity, this life as a philologist is miserable. Many struggle on their whole lives here as tutors (Privatdocent) and never arrive at being full Professors. Such a life costs a great deal, and how miserable I should feel, for there is something so uncertain in it, and one's success depends on how one pleases others by one's writings and lectures, and a risk of this kind in my circumstances seems too great. It is quite certain that I must have an assured support. On the grounds of prudence I consider philology alone as too uncertain a foundation, but that I wish to work in philology and philosophy is true. Remember the many works on these subjects by theologians and doctors. Think of distinguished philologists who have studied law. This influences me to look round for a certain position, that I may not attempt to erect an airy building, on a yet more airy foundation. Medicine is disagreeable to me; I am physically unfit for it. I like theology, but it is too unsettled and occupies too much time. There remains the law, which is certainly very dry and pedantic; but it may lead to more lively studies, and it also leaves time for other intellectual employments. One must begin everywhere in a small way. If other subjects of culture are added to the knowledge of law, that helps not a little—so one can lay the foundations of a satisfying life, for on good fortune or rather on God's will most things depend. If we do not forsake Him, He guides us at last to where we should be, however we may choose paths where we should like to walk. I have so far settled to choose my way, but if another road must be followed I shall not make myself unhappy. So do not be anxious about this.'

At Easter, 1841, Dr. Nobbe, in his farewell address to the boys who were leaving the Nicolai School, thus parted with Max Müller:—

Translation.

'I must also mention F. Max Müller from Dessau, a highly talented youth, who has just passed the final examination in his own Duchy, and who, with far from common endowments, joins the University, where he will study philology.'

On November 26, 1900, at the gathering always held in memory of the old members of the Nicolai School who have passed away in the year, the Director thus ended his mention of Max Müller, 'He was without any doubt, next to Leibniz, one of the greatest of our pupils.'

Before leaving the house of Dr. Carus, Max writes to his mother:—

Translation.

'When I remember the time that I first sent you my birthday greetings from Leipzig, and now see that this period of life is nearly over, I must gratefully acknowledge how good God has been to us in various ways, and has given us many compensations. But above all, how grateful we should be that God has preserved you, our dear mother, to us, to sweeten for us all that is bitter, to reward all effort. How I rejoice over next year, in which a new existence opens for me, a higher aim in life floats before me, and I shall have you both <sup>1</sup> with me. I cannot tell you how I rejoice at the thought of this time, when I must take another step forwards, and shall again, at all events for a time, be with my own people.'

Max Müller's old friend, Victor Carus, thus sums up his recollections of these school days :—

'Our chief recreations were pretty regular walks on Sundays during the summer, and skating in winter. There was no fencing during our school life, it was not allowed. It began at the University ; if I remember, Max went to the "Fechtboden," the official fencing-lessons of the University. On the whole there was not much free time left to us, and we were happy when my parents had some music in the evening, or when we might amuse ourselves with my father's pensionnaires. Max was a handsome boy, but not so strikingly so as in later years. He was rather thin, and gave the impression of a delicate boy, but he was strong, and not once seriously ill.'

<sup>1</sup> His mother and sister.

CHAPTER II

1841-1844

University life at Leipzig. Studies. Sanskrit. Friends. University life at Berlin. Friends. Lectures. Hagedorn. Humboldt. Bunsen.

MAX MÜLLER joined the University of Leipzig in the Summer Term, 1841; his mother and sister left Dessau and moved to Leipzig to make a home for him and lessen expenses. They occupied an apartment on the third floor of a house in Reichel's Garden, then on the very outskirts of the town, now entirely surrounded with houses. The arrangement was a very happy one; his clever, agreeable mother and pretty sister made his home bright and pleasant to his many student friends, whilst the mother wisely did not attempt to interfere with his perfect liberty. Of his studies and the immense variety of lectures he attended during his first term, Max Müller has given a full account in the Autobiography. He attended twelve separate courses of lectures, of which the subjects, except Greek and Latin, were totally new to him, yet he really worked hard at all these various subjects, took copious notes, some of which still exist, and read the books the Professors advised. He had no one to direct his studies, no father or older friend on whose advice he could rely. Later on, when he was elected to Hermann's Seminary and Haupt's Latin Society, these Professors gave him valuable help and guidance in his classical studies, and he did some work for them. It was probably the keen personal interest taken in him by Brockhaus, that led him eventually to turn his attention exclusively to Sanskrit. He entered the University as a philologist, and in the Winter Term of 1841-2 he began to study Sanskrit under the then newly appointed Professor, partly compelled, he says, by the charm of studying something which his friends and fellow students did not know. It was only in his last term at Leipzig that he first approached the subject he was to make so peculiarly his own, the Hymns of the Rig-veda.

During his time at the University, Max saw but little of his old friend Victor Carus. Dr. Carus had married again, and his house was in a part of Leipzig distant from that where Max Müller lived, and as the friends were studying totally different subjects they never met in the lecture-rooms. Professor Carus writes: 'I cannot tell you anything of Max's life as a student; the difference of our studies led us to different occupations, friendships, and ways.' Max Müller's chief friends were Theodore Fontane, so well known later as a novel writer, and Prowe, afterwards a master at the chief school at Thorn, with whom he formed an intimate friendship. Fontane gives an interesting account of a literary society which they frequented; it was a society of Leipzig poets, and to it belonged, among others, Fontane himself, Prowe, Wolfssohn, and Max Müller.

Translation.

'All made themselves a name in the small or great world. In the really great world, indeed, only one, the last named. Wolfssohn on certain points gave the tone to our society. We others were all young people of average attainments; Wolfssohn, on the contrary, was a refined man of the world. But the great feature of our club, of course from what he became afterwards, was Max Müller. He could have rivalled Wolfssohn on his own ground, that of social distinction, perhaps even beaten him, had he not been too young, only seventeen years of age. Feeling this, he kept himself in the background, and confined himself chiefly to following with the shrewd bright face of a squirrel our rodomontades on freedom, relative to our plans "pour culbuter toute l'Europe." Only now and then he himself shot off a small arrow. When the Journal for the Elegant World, which we always called for short "The Elegant," changed its editor, and appointed Heinrich Laube in the place of Gustav Kühne, Müller said, good-humouredly,

Was sich Kühne nicht erkühnt,
Wird sich Laube nicht erlauben<sup>1</sup>.

'On the whole he went his own way, both in small and great matters. He was very much loved and respected in our circle, and that not only because, as we all knew, he had been a pattern scholar at school, but more especially as the son of his distinguished father. That he would in the eyes of the world far surpass his father, we naturally never dreamt in those days.'

<sup>1</sup> Impossible to translate, from the play on the names.

Fontane seems to have left Leipzig for Dresden in 1842, and a few of Max Müller's letters to him are still extant.

Translation.

'As dumb as a fish, dear Fontane. To what purpose does the Leipzig Railway go daily, when you won't even take the trouble to send me a few lines, especially as lately you have had so much that you might have imparted to me? For some time it has not been wise to mention your name to me, and yet there was so much in my heart that I wanted to say to you. I hope you have not been idle, but will soon give us something good and new. How would it be if we wrote a novel together? There are many such. The other partner must alter nothing, and it is of the utmost importance to carry on the mutual thoughts adroitly. I have written a great deal lately, but only prose. My new name is Max Dessauer, under which name you will find several things in The Planet, i.e. several very poor things, for I must not give much of my time to them.'

Max Müller speaks here of 'writing a great deal.' Various small papers of the day published in Leipzig, The Comet, The Planet, The Shooting Star, &c., contain small tales by Max Dessauer, decidedly sentimental, and giving little promise of his future power of description and clearness of expression. There is, however, one set of papers written in 1843, Camera Obscura from Berlin, which are far in advance of the tales, and are full of clever, sarcastic remarks on Berlin ways and manners, and the frivolous life of the Berlin people of that time, always amusing themselves and always full of chatter and gossip.

In the Autobiography Max Müller tells us of three duels he fought during his three years at the University of Leipzig, and justifies these affairs as the only means of keeping the rougher elements found in every German University in order. He was greatly surprised in after years, when he first visited Oxford, to hear that duels were as unknown there as they were unnecessary.

On September 1, 1843, Max Müller passed his examination for the degree of Phil. Doc. He did not tell his mother that he meant to offer himself for examination so soon, for fear of disappointing her by failure. Too poor to buy the necessary dress coat for the occasion, he borrowed one. He passed with ease, and his mother must have felt rewarded for all her efforts and cares, when her son, still three months under twenty, laid his card, Dr. Max Müller, in her lap. Among her papers after her death the following was found copied from some English book: 'The tie of mother and son, of widowed mother and only son, the tie unlike all others in the world, not only in its blessedness, but in its divine compensation.' It would seem from the following letters written just afterwards that he had been far from well all the summer, probably overworked:—

Translation.

September, 1843.

'DEAR FONTANE,—I can well imagine that you have often cursed me not a little as I gave no sign of life for such a long time; but Morbus excusat hominem, and I will add, Nisi homo excusat morbum! I hope you have carried on your Latin studies so far as to comprehend the deep meaning of these words; and if a human heart still beats in your breast, you must pity me, poor wretch, for having spent nearly the whole vacation in a nervous fever, so that I must stay almost the whole of next term here in Leipzig. It is ill-luck, you will agree. Well, one could almost despair, but where's the good of it? I have quietly unpacked my books and things again, and sit in Reichel's Garden, up three flights, up which I have to climb with many gasps. I am in Leipzig incognito, for I had already paid my farewell visits everywhere, and altogether feel no inclination for society.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

January 4, 1844.

'Just lately I have been busy with a new edition of the Griechenlieder<sup>1</sup>, and I wrote a preface to it, as I have included the hitherto unpublished poems and the hymn to Raphael Riego. I was very much annoyed that the preface could not be printed, as what I thought of most in the new edition was to excite a feeling of contempt for those who by their policy of friendship brought the struggles of a whole people for liberty to an end: or at least to invite sympathy for a betrayed country. But if the reader welcomes the poems, as belonging to the past, no reference to the present would find favour in his eyes, and I must satisfy myself with giving a simple literary notice. You see there is nothing left but to avoid all living subjective topics, and take refuge in the objective past. So I have picked out a work from hoary antiquity and my first Opus will soon appear, a German translation of the oldest Indian collection of fables. You will find many acquaintances of childhood's days, from Gellert, La Fontaine, &c., and the interesting thing is that one can follow the wanderings of these fables, through twenty different languages, from the oldest to the most recent times, a work which I am reserving for another time. Wolfssohn has quite disappeared, and of Schauenburg I know little except that he is closely watched in Berlin.'

<sup>1</sup> The first edition of his father's poems in which he was personally concerned.

The translation of the Hitopadesa was brought out in March, 1844; the book is dedicated to Brockhaus. Towards the end of his University career at Leipzig, Prince Wilhelm of Dessau, who had in 1840 married Emilie, his mother's cousin, expressed a wish to adopt Max Müller, and put him into the Austrian Diplomatic Service. 'I at once said no,' he tells us in the Autobiography; 'it seemed to interfere with my freedom, with my studies, with my ideal of a career in life.'

Max had long felt an ardent wish to go for a year to Berlin to study Sanskrit under Bopp, but more especially Philosophy under Schelling. He wanted also to examine the collection of Sanskrit MSS. which the King of Prussia had just bought in England from the executors of Robert Chambers. His sister had been married in February of this year to a young physician, Dr. Krug, and had removed to Chemnitz; and it was settled that the mother should live there with the young couple, rather than with her son at Berlin. Max Müller had his scholarship for one year more, but it was only forty thalers (£6), and in this year (December, 1844) he would come of age, and the pension of a hundred thalers (£15), granted to his mother at the time of his father's death, would be reduced to half. How Max Müller, when away from his mother, was able to live, is certainly a puzzle, but living then in Germany was extraordinarily cheap; during a hard winter the firing for the family cost about twopence a day, and everything else was in proportion. So in March, 1844, the little home in Reichel's Garden was broken up, and the mother started for Chemnitz. On his last evening at Leipzig, which had been his home, more or less, since 1836, Max Müller writes to his mother:—

Translation.

LEIPZIG, March, 1844.

‘MY DEAR LITTLE MOTHER,—I had meant to write to you first from Berlin, when I had settled myself there, but I know you will be glad to get a letter from me sooner. How often we two [M. M. and Prowe] thought of and pitied you! I am sure it was an uncomfortable journey. We were very tired, but yet went late to bed. From the post-house we went to Reichel’s Garden. We went up into the old rooms, where we had passed many happy hours all together. It looked very desolate, and we went home, where we had tea, and were much better for it, and talked till past eleven. I was glad when I woke early to think of you three happy and comfortable together in Chemnitz. I am full of delight at the thought of Berlin, and there I shall find a letter from my dear mother. Take good care of yourself, and do not do too much. Prowe sends many affectionate messages. Write soon to

‘Your MAX.’

The following letter was written soon after he arrived in Berlin:—

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

BERLIN, April 15, 1844.

‘You have no doubt been expecting a letter from me sooner, and will have thought I was long ago settled in Berlin. But you know how it is in Dessau, how one is kept day after day, and so I only got here a few days ago, and have as yet done nothing but hunt for lodgings. Everything was very pleasant at Dessau, but it took some time before I found the various people at home. I went first to the Chamberlain, from whom I hoped to hear something definite as to the Leopold Stipendium<sup>1</sup>. Unfortunately he gave me no hope, nor did Bernhorst or Morgenstern. They were all very kind, and accepted the Hitopadesa. Bernhorst had told the Duke I was in Dessau, and came himself to tell me the Duke would see me. So on Wednesday early I went to the Pater Patriae, who talked to me a long time, but of the Stipendium or of other arrangements not a syllable. Then I went to Fräulein Rath, who told me I was to see the Duchess the next day. She too was most gracious and kind, asked me why I did not go to England, and I told her everything most openly, but it produced no result. When I went to Advocate Richter, I could not but tell him my position after the next, that is the last, payment of my scholarship. You see, dear mother, I have spared no pains. I must see now how I can help myself. I drew fifty thalers from my savings bank. I left Dessau at two o'clock, and arrived in Berlin about seven. Uncle and Aunt Hake said at once I was to stay with them as long as I liked, whilst I looked for a really nice room. I have done that most conscientiously, for to-day and yesterday I have seen at least forty. I am very tired with all this running about, and long for a quiet, settled life. I shall not pay any visits till I am settled, but when will that be ?

<sup>1</sup> A Stipendium founded by the Duke for poor scholars, and which Max Müller hoped he might have when his scholarship ceased.

Translation.

April 17.

'I have found a room, a few yards from Unter den Linden. The house is clean and light, and I like my room very much. I give for it and service and cleaning boots, six thalers (18s.) a month. It is nicely furnished, and the people of the house are clean and respectable.

'Your MAX.'

It is evident from his letters to his mother and his Diary that the early part of his time at Berlin was most agreeable. He went into society more than he had done at Leipzig, and was fortunate in having the entrée of several very pleasant houses, chief among which was the house of Hensel the artist, married to Mendelssohn's favourite sister Fanny. The Krügers, connexions of his own (he was also an artist), were very kind to the young student, and he dined there every Sunday, unless he had any other invitation. His aunt, Julie Hake, also had him to dinner every week. At Berlin, Max Müller began keeping a journal, and continued it fairly regularly till August. He seems to have dined, when not asked out, at a restaurant, where he paid sixpence for his dinner, which he reports as good. He matriculated as a theologian! Soon after, he writes: 'Worked early, but could not concentrate myself'; and adds the same evening, 'Dreaming, and a little poetry, and a very little work. I must work more in future.' A few days later he paid his first visit to the Library in search of Sanskrit MSS., which he seems to have been unable to see owing to the absence of the head librarian.

Towards the end of April he met Fontane as an Imperial Grenadier at Kosch's, where he dined. 'He came to me at five, and we talked of many things, and finally of the Divine and Human. He is a fine fellow, and has to submit to a good deal.' Fontane writes of these times:—

Translation.

'I had a strong affection for Müller from the first at Leipzig, but we only became really intimate three years later, when we were both for a time in Berlin, he at his Sanskrit studies, I as a Kaiser Franz Grenadier. He lived then on the third floor of a corner house, close to the Werder'sche Kirche, where he, greatly to his own satisfaction, lodged with a shoemaker. If only the workshop had not been next his room! The beating of leather went on the whole day long, and Müller would have lost all patience, but for the wonderful view. The whole town lay like a panorama before him, especially the royal palace with its beautiful gardens. To look at this was a real solace, and he held out against the noise. He already gave promise of becoming some one, and rejoiced in being in especial favour with Friedrich Rückert, who in these years, yielding to the King's wish, gave lectures at the University. Max Müller was then translating, among other works, Kālidāsa's Cloud Messenger. If I owe all I know of Russian Literature to Wolfssohn, I owe to Müller what little I learnt about Sanskrit poetry. He still showed the same, not ironical, but kindly, mischievous temperament which he already possessed in Leipzig.'

Max Müller had expected great things from Schelling, and in a letter to his mother thus describes his first visit to the great philosopher:—

Translation.

'I went to announce myself. He receives people at four o'clock. I had not expected much, for I had heard how he had dismissed Jellinick, but I was more fortunate. I asked him if he would continue to lecture next term on the Philosophy of Revelation. He said he could not decide yet, therefore probably only a private lecture again. Then I spoke to him of my time in Leipzig, of Weiss and Brockhaus, and then we came round to Indian Philosophy. Here he allowed me to tell him a good deal. I especially dwelt on the likeness between Sankhya and his own system, and remarked how an inclination to the Vedānta showed itself. He asked what we must understand by Vedānta, how the existence of God was proved, how God created the world, whether it had reality. He has been much occupied with Colebrooke's Essays, and he seemed to wish to learn more, as he asked me if I could explain a text. Then he asked where I was living, knew my father as Greek poet and a worker on Homer, and at last dismissed me with "Come again soon," offering to do anything he could for me.'

The following letters give his mother a pleasant account of his life:—

Translation.

May, 1844.

'Hensel's house is a delightful resort to me, and she is especially friendly. I go there oftener than I can really spare the time; they are always sending me invitations. I was there last Saturday, and they asked me to dinner the next day. I went at twelve, for a large musical matinée; they sang the choruses of the Antigone. Then I stayed in the garden with the tutor, and we played with Hensel a sort of ninepins; then came dinner, and they asked me to return in the evening, as Oehlenschläger, the German poet, was coming to them, so I spent nearly the whole day there. I have not played there yet, as she has not asked me to do so, but when I told her I wanted to hire a piano, cheap but not bad, she offered to lend me an English one, on which she used to play. He too is most friendly, and has given himself a great deal of trouble to get leave from the Minister for me to have the MSS. to use in my own room, which I hope will soon be granted. The Hakes too are very kind, and I can always dine there, Mondays and Thursdays. I have called besides on Bopp; Professor Höfer, who will review my Hitopadesa; Dr. Kuhn, another Sanskritist, to whom Brockhaus recommended me; Professor Petermann, whose lectures on the history of Oriental Literature I attend; Professor Schott, with whom I learn Persian; and I think everything will go well. I am also going to Schelling, from which my purse suffers. I have not had time to call again on "Bettina." As friends I have Vogel and Fontane, whom I seldom see except at dinner. At home I only have bread and butter. I drink coffee without milk or sugar. I have just received ten copies of the Griechenlieder; they are very well printed. So you see I do very well here, and nothing is wanting but my dear little mother. Now write soon, but don't say again you do not like Chemnitz; a contented spirit is happy anywhere. In the Hitopadesa it says, "To the man who has leather shoes on, the whole world is covered with leather."

Translation.

May 22.

'Four days in the week I have lectures at eight; the woman cleans my room, then I stay at home till 1.30, and then dine close here. Then some days I have a lecture at four o'clock, and I am very glad to be living so close to the University, and shall be more so when the real Berlin heat begins.'

Translation.

May 28.

'I have just come from Hensel's. As you see, I am a pretty constant guest. They are really so good to me, and it is the only house where I feel "you would like to go there"; generally one feels "you must go there." You say, you are glad that I don't work so hard; I can't quite understand that, for I often don't know what I should begin first, when I think of the future and on so much which I still have to do before I can take any rest. . . . I do not often see any papers, as the public reading-rooms are so dear; in this respect you are better off in Chemnitz.'

Max Müller seems soon to have found out the expense of the life at Berlin, and the old doubts whether he could afford the life of a scholar revived. On June 26 he writes to his mother:—

Translation.

'I must make the most of my time in Berlin, as I cannot stay here more than a year, unless I can find some chance of lessening my expenses. Where I am to go next Easter is not at all certain. I hesitate between Paris, Vienna, and Bonn. I am attracted to Vienna by the thought of studying Persian and Turkish, for which there are better means than in Paris, and they are certainly necessary should I ever have the chance of employment in the East. You can fancy that these plans often disturb me, as for the nearest future I have no certain prospect; and the University course is so expensive and wearisome, that I cannot reckon on it, as generally for the first three years, that is six years after leaving school, one is not admitted to anything. Well, one must console oneself with the lilies of the field!'

Two days later he writes in his Diary: 'I cannot give up Sanskrit, though it holds out no prospect for me.' Over and over again come the entries in his Diary: 'All day at home'—'no dinner'—'dinner of stirred eggs' (which he prepared himself)—'work till 3 a.m.'

At this time he began Bengali, 'which may perhaps be useful to me later, and is now for comparison with the low Indian dialects. I attend Schelling's course more diligently and with great interest; his philosophy has something Oriental about it. I am translating the Kathâka Upanishad for him with great diligence.'

The term at Berlin which had begun so cheerily was now drawing to an end. Max Müller had not found pupils or sufficient employment in copying Sanskrit MSS. to eke out his small stipend, and just before returning to Chemnitz he wrote almost despairingly to his mother:—

Translation.

Aug. 19.

'I am longing to be away from Berlin, to get a thorough change of thought, as I really think I had every chance here of becoming a confirmed hypochondriac. This is no mere transitory feeling, but it is founded on my circumstances, which have cost me many sad thoughts latterly. I acknowledge that the plan of life I had formed is not to be realized; that it is difficult for me to part with all these favourite ideas you can well imagine. And yet I see that it would be folly in my circumstances to attempt a University career. You tell me that I still have 800 thalers<sup>1</sup> (£120), but this would only just last till I had settled where to live, and that I should then have the prospect of living for five years as a tutor (Privatdocent) without any stipend from Government. I should therefore in this way study on to starve, just in order not to give up an idea which I had taken up for my own pleasure, and to which I had sacrificed much money and time. Had I more courage or only anywhere a firm point to cling to, I could perhaps still try my chance, but as it is, nothing remains for me but to become a sensible schoolmaster, which at all events gives one bread and butter. You will feel that a certain amount of resignation is needed for such a decision, and therefore I rejoice all the more at the thought of the next few weeks, which will repay me for many sad hours.'

He spent the vacation at Chemnitz, where the society of his mother and sister cheered and encouraged him. It is not clear how he found funds to finish his course at Berlin, but he probably used part of the small patrimony already alluded to.

He returned to Berlin early in October, and soon after his return received the pleasant news that, in answer to an appeal from his mother for a prolongation of the full pension for a time, the Duke had granted it for another five years. The Duke's letter was an encouragement to the young scholar to persevere in his chosen path :—

Translation.

'According to your petition of the twenty-eighth of last month I have ordered that the pension granted you of a hundred thalers shall be continued in full for the next five years, till 1849 inclusive. I hope that your promising son may continue to give you as much cause for joy as hitherto, and I gladly take this opportunity to assure you of my special good wishes.'

LEOPOLD.

'DESSAU, Oct. 10, 1844.'

He writes to his mother again on October 24 :—

<sup>1</sup> Some money left by W. Müller, and religiously guarded by his mother to start him in life.

Translation.

BERLIN.

'I hope you make yourself as happy in the backstream of life as I do. As I sit here in my garret and for days together see no one I know, I fancy myself as a bird alone in its nest on a tall tree, and Leipzig, Chemnitz, and Dessau appear perfect Eldorados. But I am quite happy and amuse myself, by myself, as far as possible. But I must tell you how I kept your birthday. I thought the Hakes would have invited me that we might drink your health together; but as they did not, I invited Fontane for the evening, who brought a friend, and we brewed punch, set your picture on the table, and drank your health right joyously. I have heard from Dessau that I cannot have the scholarship for a seventh term. Well, I have enough for the present, and I think of the birds in the sky; they have no fire, yet they don't freeze, but I do freeze.'

This term Max Müller does not seem to have attended many lectures, but worked in his room on Pâli and Hindûstânî and on translations from the Sanskrit. He finished his translation of the Meghadûta, and submitted it both to Rückert and Brockhaus. His MS., with Rückert's notes in pencil, still exists; and Brockhaus wrote to him as follows:—

Translation.

'I have read your translation with the greatest delight. You have conquered a great difficulty, and reproduced this peculiar artificial poetry in intelligible, and at the same time poetic, language. You have wisely omitted many isolated traits in order to preserve the principal picture, and to give the reader not accustomed to such pictures a clear idea of the whole. Your idea appears to me almost everywhere the right one. In a few places, I should take a different view, but you have been able to use explanatory materials with which I am not acquainted, and which, no doubt, justify you in many points.'

Towards the end of November the old family friend, Baron Hagedorn, suddenly appeared in Berlin, and invited Max Müller to stay with him in Paris, to carry on his Sanskrit work. Baron Hagedorn was born near Dessau in the house of a forester, where his mother left him and never returned. It was evident that his parents were wealthy, as a large sum was yearly paid by a banker in Frankfort for his maintenance. As a schoolboy he had been boarded with Frau Klausnitzer, the mother of the Cousin Emilie so often mentioned in Max Müller's letters, and thus became the intimate friend of the family.

Max writes on his twenty-first birthday to tell his mother of his unexpected happiness :—

Translation.

Dec. 6.

‘MY DEARLY LOVED MOTHER,—As I am sitting here quite alone on my birthday (the twenty-first) I must give myself at least the delight of writing to those who love me so, and whom I dearly love. And first of all comes my darling little mother. My best thanks for your love and goodness, which in many things are far too great. I wrote to Frau Rath to ask for a letter of introduction from the Duchess to Alexander von Humboldt. Very soon after, Frau Rath wrote in the most friendly way, sending me the Duchess's letter. I left this with my card for Humboldt. The other day I passed half an hour with him, and a few days later came a letter from him saying I should have the Sanskrit MSS. at home, which ever since Easter I had begged for in vain from the Minister. As to my Meghadûta, it has been a long time with Professor Brockhaus in Leipzig, who at last returned it. I then gave it to Rückert, with whom I am learning Persian, and who remembers my father with great affection. He has given me many valuable hints with regard to versification, and even improved several of the verses himself. I shall send it in a few days to Mayer Wigand, as I should like to see it printed before I leave for Paris. I wish I could see you, darling mother, and talk over all the unexpected and undeserved kindness that has been shown me. I went Thursday early to Hagedorn, and we talked over everything; and the result is he has asked me to go to Paris with him, to live with him there and work. So in about four weeks from to-day I shall be in Paris. Hagedorn will tell you all this himself more fully. The only thing to settle is, shall I come for a few days to Chemnitz before I start? As you can fancy, I should like to do so very much, only I am afraid it would give us more pain than pleasure.’

During the short time Max Müller still passed in Berlin after receiving the letter of introduction from the Duchess of Dessau, he must have seen Humboldt often enough to impress the great man most favourably; for on November 27, 1844, Chevalier Bunsen, then Prussian Minister in London, wrote to his friend Archdeacon Hare :—

‘I have received from a highly respected quarter<sup>1</sup> a very strong

<sup>1</sup> i. e. Humboldt, and also Baroness Stolzenberg, who herself wrote to Bunsen about her young cousin.

recommendation of a young man of twenty-two (sic) years of age, much thought of by Schelling. He has made himself known by a new edition of the Hitopadesa from the Sanskrit, and is a general scholar altogether distinguished. He desires to live some years in England. He is the son of the celebrated poet and philologist Wilhelm Müller (author of the Griechenlieder and Römische Ritornellen), of high moral character, and as far as I know of serious convictions.'

In quoting this letter in the Life of her distinguished husband, Baroness Bunsen adds:—

'This is the first indication of an important event in the life of Bunsen, the acquaintance which at once became warm friendship with Dr. Max Müller, now Professor at Oxford; and his approach is hailed as the rising of a beneficent luminary on the horizon. The kindred mind, their sympathy of heart, the unity in highest aspirations, a congeniality in principle, a fellowship in the pursuit of favourite objects which attracted and bound Bunsen to his young friend, rendered this connexion one of the happiest of his life.'

But nearly two years were to pass before Max Müller met this friend, patron, and benefactor; whose kindly influence was to alter the course of his whole life.

CHAPTER III

1845-1846

Paris. Lonely, struggling life. Gathy. Burnouf. Rig-veda.
Rachel. Dvarikanath Tagore. Boehtlingk.

ARCHDEACON HARE lost no time in responding to the letter of November 27 from Chevalier Bunsen, for we find a note from Max Müller to the Chevalier dated 'Chemnitz, January 1, 1845,' which implies that one, if not more letters had already passed between them as to a tutorship in an English family, suggested by the Archdeacon. But we will leave Max to tell his own further story in his Diary.

Translation.

Bonn, March 6, 1845.

'Once more a new change in my life, and once more an attempt at something definite. My stay in Berlin is over; I have made many and influential friends there—Schelling, Rückert, Humboldt, Bopp, Jacobi, Mendelssohn. My views of life become clearer and more sensible, my inner life more active and more independent of outward circumstances. There was not much to be gained in knowledge in Berlin; the learned men are too learned, too reserved, and do not attempt to gain any influence; and even the treasures of the Library were long closed to me, till a word from Humboldt put an end to the constant refusals of the librarian Pertz and the Minister. In December Hagedorn came to Berlin and asked me to stay with him in Paris, and just then I received an offer to go as a tutor to London. Great indecision. At length decided on Paris and its pleasant independence, though at the same time I did not refuse all other possible offers. I had a longing for Paris, and I soon went to Chemnitz, saw Hagedorn in Dessau, where he was dawdling. I was some time in Chemnitz and had a good deal of society, balls, sledge-parties, &c., but not a word from Hagedorn. So I started at last for Dessau, not feeling much confidence in Hagedorn. When we met we got on very well and settled everything. On February 26 I started for Paris. In Cöthen the train was stopped by the snow, and we returned by extra post to Dessau. Here Hagedorn found business letters which kept him. At last, March 3, I started alone for Hanover. The 4th to Elberfeld; at night by post to Deutz, arriving early in Cologne; railway to Bonn. Table d'hôte in Hotel de Trèves; two English families, whom I could not understand; very cross. Afternoon to Lassen, not very interesting talk; five o'clock, lecture by Dahlmann on Publicity, Coming of Age, Jury, &c.; very remarkable, quiet, no gesticulations, irrefutable, convincing, a skilful man. In Bonn the old topics still going on—Catholicism, the Holy Coat, and Protestantism.

PARIS, March 15.

'My journey is happily over. I left Bonn on the 6th for Cologne, and started on the 8th for Brussels; here I found myself already in the midst of French, which I found very troublesome. I stayed the night. On the 9th I started at three o'clock by train. On the way difficulties with the douane and my passport; the 10th at three o'clock I arrived in Paris.'

Max Müller has himself given us an amusing account of his difficulties on his arrival in Paris, owing to Hagedorn having failed either to write or appear; and though he stayed in Paris till June, 1846, as Hagedorn never came he lived at his own expense in Hagedorn's rooms, instead of being his friend's guest as was at first arranged. If he found economy necessary in Berlin, it was far more so in Paris, where soon after his arrival he says, 'I am spending a lot of money'; though in his carefully kept accounts there are very few entries but for dinner—for which, unless he went 'hors la barrière,' he had to pay two francs—and copying paper, the amount of which shows how hard he was working. His life was very lonely; he at first knew hardly any one but some of the employés at the Library, and he says, March 17, 'I feel very lonely and forsaken, and of Paris I see nothing'; and again, 'Great inertia and fatigue, and out of spirits, no inclination for work'; and yet he writes cheerily to his mother not to distress her:—

Translation.

PARIS, April 10, 1845.

'Of course I have heard nothing from Hagedorn, and therefore do not expect to see him very soon. But it is well I did not further postpone my journey, for Humboldt being here has been of the greatest use to me, and he goes away now very soon. He is kindness itself, and is even thought more of in Paris than in Berlin. It is very difficult to get leave here to take out MSS. to work at at home, and the Prussian Minister, under whose protection I am here—for in Paris no one has heard of such a land as Anhalt Dessau—is so stupid that he has never given his guarantee for such a purpose, whilst all other Ambassadors, even the Turkish, are constantly doing so. Humboldt knew this, but told me he thought I should find his own guarantee considered quite satisfactory; and it is quite true. I soon had the MSS. in my hands, and was treated in so friendly a way by all the employés, that I was quite astonished, till at last I was told, “Vous êtes si vivement recommandé par M. Humboldt, il n’y a pas une meilleure recommandation.” As to the printed books, I have not yet got the permit, but hope soon to do so, though this is more difficult; leave is seldom given, and all Paris, learned and unlearned, sit in the reading-room, packed like herrings, and read there. I have been now for some time in full swing of work, and only wish there were more strength in the machine, for there is endless work to be done here. You will wish for a description of my life; that is soon given. I get up early, have breakfast, i.e. bread and butter, no coffee. I stay at home and work till seven, go out and have dinner, come back in an hour, and stay at home and work till I go to bed. So you see I know nothing of Paris but from my appetite, which has got over its first astonishment at the excellence of everything, and now rather wonders that the Paris restaurants are so renowned. But one thing I have seen, that is, that everything in Paris is terribly expensive. With 12,000 francs a year one could live here nicely; I am afraid I shall hardly work my income up to that. I am on the whole well, though I must live most economically and avoid every expense not actually necessary. The free lodging is an immense help, for unless one lives in a perfect hole, one must pay 50 or 60 francs a month and 10 francs for service, 60 francs dinner, 30 francs breakfast; this makes 160 francs a month without light and fire, or washing and clothes, nearly 2,000 francs a year. Theatres, cafés, &c., are very dear, particularly for foreigners, who don’t know how to manage; so I have not been to any theatre, except one evening, when I had to pay 2 francs for a cup of chocolate. I thought, “Never again.” But don’t think I have nothing to amuse me. I can only say, one walk on the Boulevards is far better than two evenings at the Chemnitz theatre. It is a strange feeling to be so entirely strange among the thousands of faces that pass by one, and for interesting observation there is no place like this. How often I say to myself, “Oh, if mother were only here.” Yesterday and to-day are called in the serious world Holy Thursday and Good Friday; here they are called Longchamps, and all Paris is driving out through the Champs Élysées in their finest clothes, but looking miserable in this cold. The hero of the day is General Tom Thumb; the Rue Richelieu is blocked the days he receives; the aristocracy vie with each other in running after him, and of course Louis Philippe at their head. I have seen both heroes without paying—Tom Thumb in his carriage, which is about as big as a child's go-cart, and the King to-day for the first time when I crossed the Place du Carrousel just as they were on parade, and the old King was riding round bare-headed with all his suite. I was only twenty paces from him; he has a very characteristic face, full, with thick grey curly hair, but in spite of his dignity something cunning and crafty in his eyes. I see his likeness but too often, that is whenever I have to pay away a five-franc piece, which, alas! happens frequently. By-the-by I have just paid 50 francs for books; what do you say to that? Gathy<sup>1</sup> sent me one day a ticket for a concert, where I saw the beau monde of Paris; he is most friendly to me. Twice a week I go to lectures at the Collège de France. It is some way off; but they are very good, and I pay nothing and I hear French spoken, for which otherwise I have hardly any opportunity. But enough of my life here, which, if on the whole very simple, keeps me in good spirits as you see, and at all events does not as yet interfere with my work. But you can fancy that in this utterly strange land I sometimes feel lonely and forsaken, and would gladly find myself for a few hours in Chemnitz with you all. But the best cure for such thoughts is continuous work, and that I have. And then when I think of you all I feel I am not so far from you; I know all you would say to me if I were sitting with you, and all that you are often in your thoughts saying to me. Separation loses its bitterness when we have faith in each other and in God. Faith in each other keeps us close together in life, and faith in God keeps us together in eternity. But I see I am talking Sanskrit philosophy instead of simply telling you not to be unhappy, not to make yourself and others uneasy, but try to enjoy life in this lovely spring weather, whether in Chemnitz or Dresden. How gladly I would have put something in the letter for Auguste's birthday from the Paris shops, for the sight of the splendid and tastefully arranged windows is most tempting. But, alas! my purse suffers from chronic consumption; you know this family complaint, which has followed me to Paris.'

Max Müller's first visit to Burnouf was paid on March 20, and was the beginning of a friendship to which he looked back with affectionate gratitude to the last year of his life.

<sup>1</sup> His childhood's friend. See p. 5.

DIARY.

Translation.

‘Went to Burnouf. Spiritual, amiable, thoroughly French. He received me in the most friendly way, talked a great deal, and all he said valuable, not on ordinary topics but on special. I managed better in French than I expected. “I am a Brâhman, a Buddhist, a Zoroastrian; I hate the Jesuits”—that is the sort of man. I am looking forward to his lectures.’

Max Müller describes his teacher as ‘Small, his face decidedly German, only lighted up with a constant sparkle which is distinctively French. I must have seemed very stupid to him when I tried to explain what I really wanted to do in Paris. He told me afterwards that he could not make me out at first. His lectures were on the Rig-veda, and opened a new world to me. He explained to us his own researches, he showed us new MSS. which he had received from India, in fact he did all he could to make us fellow workers.’

In Burnouf’s select class Max Müller met men who, many of them, remained his firm friends through life, as Barthélemy-St.-Hilaire, the Abbé Bardelli, Thomas Goldstücker, and a few others. Max Müller survived them all. When he was in Paris for the Centenary of the Institute in 1895 he paid a long visit to Barthélemy-St.-Hilaire, finding him, as had been his custom for years, sitting by lamplight with the daylight carefully excluded. The old man, then ninety years of age, died soon after, and his friend wrote an eloquent and appreciative account of his life and work in the Times of November 29, 1895.

Max Müller recalls also a visit to Humboldt, whom he found at the Collège de France: ‘His friendliness and true kindness make me feel quite shy; I hardly know what to say. “If you were only a little more practical in your views,” he said, which startled me. He then wrote a long letter to Reinaud and gave me his Cosmos to read, and left me with reiterated assurances of his wish to help me.’

Max seems to have gone through a good deal of drudgery in mastering French, and often took refuge with Gathy, ‘to make up by talking German the tortures I suffer in talking French.’ Another day he says, ‘I did hardly anything but study this abominable language; how much time I have wasted on it! yet it is necessary that I should get some fluency in expressing myself.' Gathy occasionally gave him a concert ticket, and he speaks of amusing himself by making walks of discovery about Paris: 'and people look at me, and I know no one; it seems as if I hardly belong to the genus of animaux sociables.'

He appears to have found it difficult at first to decide on the distinctive work he should take up; 'the same life, which has almost become unbearable; I long for work to occupy my mind.' He read a good deal of French. Balzac: 'all his works that I know treat of the analysis, the anatomy of love, before and after marriage; he knows married life and dissects it with artistic skill.' Paul de Kock: 'colourless babyish reading, often droll, some characters well conceived.' It was the influence of Burnouf that decided him to take up the Hymns of the Rig-veda, with the great native commentary of Sâyana, as his distinctive work. 'Either study Indian philosophy or study Indian religion and copy the Hymns and Sâyana,' said Burnouf. To the youth of only twenty-one, knowing hardly half a dozen people, living alone up five flights of stairs, often not speaking to a soul for twenty-four hours round, life may well have seemed dreary; and yet he never for one moment really regretted the choice he had made, and his old master, Professor Brockhaus, gave him constant encouragement. Brockhaus writes from Leipzig:—

Translation.

June 4, 1845.

'You have delighted me very much by the few lines you have sent me from Paris, from which I see with what active interest you pursue your study of Sanskrit. It is very natural that you should turn to the Vedas with decided preference; one becomes more and more attached to these old monuments the more one studies them, and when once one can survey them as a whole, they make a much more powerful impression than one would expect from isolated fragments.'

He never allowed his letters to his mother to show the fierce struggle it was to live.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

PARIS, May 5.

'One's money runs away here, one does not know how, and though of course it costs one more in the beginning, the daily wants do not lessen. That I am as saving as possible you may be sure, for it is my greatest wish to stay here as long as possible, where I have found so much necessary to my studies. On amusements I have really spent nothing, and have not yet been to Versailles, or other places round, though I am often tempted when I see the great placards on the walls; but that is easily set aside if I can attain my other object. I shall not order any summer things, for I need not make myself smart, that is one advantage of being unknown.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

PARIS, June 11, 1845.

'Have I already told you that I am collecting here the materials for an edition of the oldest Veda, and gather together everything I can find? This is the oldest and most important book in India, perhaps the oldest book that exists. The Commentary written in Sanskrit fills four folios, each of a thousand pages, which must all be copied out and compared with other MSS., and this is the most important and necessary work. Now I must see what I can do—only health and money, that is the question. I have lately met a Sanskrit scholar here who has been three years in Paris, and has just come back from London. We have worked a great deal together, and I have for some weeks been with him day and night, which my portier takes very ill, and I certainly could not make him understand that I had been doing nothing but work; altogether there are odd rumours about Monsieur Max, as I am called, who drinks no coffee early, eats till evening only two dry rolls (the butter is knocked off), and writes Hebrew the whole day.'

When copying MSS. for others his plan was to work the whole night through, and the second night only sleep two hours on his bed without undressing, the third night to go to bed and then begin again. He had told his mother nothing of what he calls in his Diary an abominable time from April 26 to May 4, when he suffered frightfully and without intermission from toothache. 'I could do nothing, neither write, nor eat, nor go out. I felt abandoned by every one, no one to pity me or take care of me.' At length he crawled to Gathy, who sent him to a dentist. 'I went home quite exhausted; the portier and his daughter took endless care of me when they saw how weak and suffering I was, and brought me broth and chocolate. It was a black week.'

All this time no news came from his uncertain friend Hagedorn, and his want of money soon began to cause him great anxiety. 'It was indeed a hard struggle, far harder than those who have known me in later life would believe. It was a hard fight, and cannot have been very good for me physically, but I do not regret it now; often did I go without my dinner, being quite satisfied with boiled eggs and bread and butter.' He had chosen his own line, and instead of settling down in Germany as a teacher in some school with a fixed salary, as most of his friends wished, or going as tutor to England, he had taken the tiny patrimony still left him after the expenses of the University, and had determined to carry on his beloved Sanskrit studies. 'It was in my own hands whether I should sink or swim.' There is a passage in an American novel, The Increasing Purpose, by J. A. Allen, which exactly applies to Max Müller's struggles in Paris and London, and the effect on his whole character for life. One could almost fancy Mr. Allen had known him. Speaking of a man choosing his work in life, Allen says:—

'Yet happy ye, whether the waiting be for short time or long time, if only it bring on meanwhile the struggle. One sure reward you have then, though there may be none other, just the struggle, and the marshalling to the front of rightful forces, with effort, endurance, devotion, the putting resolutely back of forces wrongful, the hardening of all that is soft within, the softening of all that is hard; until out of the hardening and the softening result the better tempering of the soul's metal, and higher development of those two qualities which are best in man, and best in his ideal of his Maker, strength and kindness, power and mercy. Real struggling is itself real living, and no ennobling thing of this earth is ever to be had by man on any other terms; . . . a divine end is to be reached, through divine means, a great work requires a great preparation.'

The four years Max Müller spent after leaving his mother at Leipzig were this time of preparation, by means of a great struggle, for the brilliant success of his after-life.

It is pleasant to read of a little variety in a life of such incessant work, when in October, 1845, a friend took him one night to the Théâtre Français, where he saw Rachel in Phèdre.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

'She is a wonderful actress in her own style, but the part of Phèdre is so horrible, that though one must admire the perfection of representation, one has no real enjoyment from it. Then from the beginning to the end Rachel was nothing but a pale shadow whose only life is passion and despair, but passion which fails in all tragic effect because it has no influence on one's own feelings. It is a crude and painful passion with which she is possessed, and in which there is nothing to awake our sympathy. It is a tragedy which, on the Greek stage only, could represent men in their struggle with fate, with blind unalterable fate, which avenges the sin of the father in the sex of Phèdre; if this one moral motive is wanting, as on the French stage, the whole loses its deep meaning, and nothing remains but the sensual longing, which is neither great nor elevating. Then Rachel stood alone; the other actors were but foils to her. After that—so characteristic of the French, who like to see everything without feeling anything—came a comedy of Molière, Le Médecin malgré lui, which was very well played.'

One most interesting acquaintance Max Müller made in Paris, Dvarkanath Tagore, a rich Hindoo, who, though no student of ancient Sanskrit himself, took a lively interest in the young scholar presented to him by Burnouf at the Institut de France. He invited Max Müller to his house, and they spent many an hour together talking or enjoying music, for the Hindoo was a good musician, had a fine voice, and had been fairly well taught. He liked Max Müller to accompany him when singing either Italian or French music. After a time he was persuaded to sing Persian and real Indian music, and when his hearer confessed that he saw no beauty in it, neither melody, rhythm, nor harmony, his Indian friend lectured him on the prejudices of Western nations, who turn away from all that is strange and unpleasing to them. Max pacified him by assuring him that he knew that India possessed a remarkable science of music founded on mathematics. He was present at the great party given by Dvarkanath Tagore to Louis Philippe, when the room was hung with Indian shawls, afterwards distributed among the most distinguished guests. It was at this time also that Max Müller saw a good deal of Baron d'Eckstein, who employed him frequently in copying MSS. for him.

All this while Max Müller was working hard in preparing a correct text of the Hymns of the Rig-veda, together with a perfect text of Sâyana's Commentary, and the work was so far advanced that the question of a publisher had to be considered. It required a large capital to print and publish a work of six thousand pages quarto, and at the same time pay the editor enough to live on. The idea of publication by a publisher at Königsberg, with the help of subscriptions, which is mentioned in the letters to his mother, and for which a prospectus was actually printed and circulated from London, was abandoned, when in the spring of 1847 the East India Company undertook the task. The following letter to his mother gives an account of his plans and prospects to the close of 1845 :—

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

PARIS, Dec. 23, 1845.

'You know on the whole a great deal about my work, but less on the plans that depend on it. As the printing of the Veda could not be undertaken by any publisher on account of the cost and length of the work, I was obliged, though there is no chance of printing for the next two or three years, to apply to several Governments and Academies, to find out how such a work could best be carried out. I therefore made inquiries through friends in London and St. Petersburg, and received tolerably reassuring answers from both places. In London, Wilson, the father of Sanskrit literature, declared himself ready to get the work undertaken by the University of Oxford; but only on condition that he should publish the text of the Rig-veda, and I, in conjunction with other young Sanskrit students, the text of the Commentary, which is really the most important work, and fills about eight thousand pages. This, as far as it went, was very well and a great honour; but as the two other students were leaving London, one for Petersburg, the other for Tübingen, it was necessary I should settle in London, and for that I have no money. At the same time Herr Boehtlingk wrote from Petersburg that he could persuade the Academy to print the work, but with a condition that I worked with him, and gave up the publication of the text to him. As the publication of the text is, as I said, of little scientific importance, only for the credit of being the first to publish the full text of the Veda, I wrote that I was ready to accept the offer if a sum of money were promised me, to recoup me for the expense of copying this enormous Commentary, and other books necessary for reference, or that a place should be found for me in Petersburg, where I should have to live, which would enable me in a few years to put by enough to repay myself. To this I have had no answer. At the same time I thought of Berlin, and wrote to Humboldt and Bopp, and sent them a detailed prospectus of my work, and asked if any of the rich funds there could be applied to printing the Commentary. Humboldt soon sent me a very kind letter, in which indeed he gave no definite results, but said he thought it was impossible in Prussia, and urged me emphatically to accept the invitation from London or from Petersburg. This was the state of things, when within the last few days I received from Hase, one of the sub-librarians of the Bibliothèque Royale, a suggestion to go as tutor with the Bavarian Minister, Baron von Cetto, to London. Unexpected as the idea was, I at once resolved to do everything I could to obtain the post, and for the last few days have been in communication with the Baron, who is in Paris. Everything seemed arranged, when this morning, at the last visit, I discovered that the post was impossible for me, as he required me to promise, in writing, that I would never be away from the children for an hour, never go anywhere without them; in fact I should have led a monastic life. Strongly as I felt it was my duty to do all that was in my power to secure a post in which I could gain my own living, and deeply as the feeling has weighed on me, more especially of late, of being a burden to others, and well as I knew that to many of my relations such a post would appear most advantageous, such regulations seemed to me so degrading and foolish that I told his Excellency so, and took my leave. I was quite ready, though I dislike teaching, to take the post. It was a good one, all expenses paid and 3,000 francs; and then I should be in London, which however necessary for my work seemed unattainable in any other way, and before everything else it was a certain substantial position, which would free me from many disagreeables, and in which, instead of taking money from you, my dearest mother, I could have given you some little pleasure. But it was impossible, unless I sacrificed my whole future, and wasted the little I have already done; and I hope that as I feel I have little to reproach myself with, I shall not be blamed by others. I shall work on till I hear something definite from London or Petersburg; if neither negotiation leads to definite results, I must return next spring to Germany, and settle down in Berlin, or more probably in Königsberg. That I have not thought much of myself in all this you will see, as I was ready to go into exile for four or five years, without any chance of seeing you, my dearest mother, or seeing or speaking to any creature belonging to me. They have been trying days through which I have lately lived, and trying nights too, in which I struggled to subdue my heart and intellect, with all my inclinations and ambitions, that I might do what really seemed my duty; and even now, when I can breathe freely, I feel the pressure, for I have learnt that life is difficult, and why? because of that cursed money, which so many throw away, which makes thousands miserable, and very few happy; yes, there must be a curse on money that is not won by honest toil. But enough of these lamentations, which are of no use, least of all in Paris. Melancholy and frivolity are the two scales in which men here go up and down; happy he who sits in the middle quiet and observant as an Indian Muni. Now for Paris. In the first place, I have moved now and lost my beautiful view and look into the court. The rooms are good, fifth floor; changing was very tiresome and very dear, and I have had many difficulties, caused by Hagedorn's silence, and had to arrange about his furniture and everything. As he never writes, I have again had to get 200 francs from Lederhose, and with the money you have just sent shall manage till January or February. I have sent away my piano, for it cost too much. I can well fancy that you think life here very expensive. I have been told it is dearer in Berlin, but in Berlin one can manage economies better than here; it is the actual necessities of life that cost so much in Paris. My birthday went by very quietly. Gathy came early to see me, and I fetched some cakes and a bottle of wine which was in Hagedorn's cellar, which, bon gré, mal gré, he had to contribute as a birthday present, and we drank my health. My Christmas will be very quiet and lonely, for it is not a festa here. I think I shall go to bed at six o'clock and dream. This old year has gone faster than any before, and I was really amazed when I said to myself, I am twenty-two years old. My wish for the New Year is a speedy joyful meeting.'

The letter from Humboldt mentioned above runs thus:—

Translation.

BERLIN, December 8, 1845.

I hasten—though only in a few lines, for I am harassed by many duties—to thank you, dear doctor, for your kind keepsake<sup>1</sup>. I seriously advise you to accept the offer made to you from England or Russia. After all my inquiries, and knowing what I do about the amount of contribution which may be expected from the Government here, it does not seem to me in the least likely that even Bopp and Lassen, Professors of different Universities and personally devoted to this special work, could send you means to print a thousand pages of the Veda. Life here is so much more prosaic, and it is inadvisable to raise misgivings or qualms . . . and your well-considered and well-written prospectus contains hints of spoliation. Here one is so cosmopolitan that one does not care where the Veda may appear, whether in Germany, Oxford, Paris, or St. Petersburg.

<sup>1</sup> M. M.'s translation of the Hitôpadêsa.

I know many of your promising writings, and as I am proud of possessing warm German national feelings, I am sorry that I cannot send you a more satisfactory answer to your request. With kind regards, yours

A. v. HUMBOLDT.

Just after the last letter to his mother, Max Müller was taken ill with influenza and rheumatism, and for a whole month was unable to work or do anything. He explains his further plans to his mother in the following letter:—

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

February 17, 1846.

‘I have been quite ill. I got a bad chill early in January (chiefly by being up in the cold nights hunting fleas), and the whole month had so much rheumatism in my head and back that I had at last to go to bed, and there for several days I was very feverish. The worst is that I have lost a whole month’s work, for I got so weak I could not hold a pen. And imagine all that time, the swarms of fleas which would have driven a strong man almost mad. As soon as I was a little better, I sent for the landlord, and told him I would give up the rooms at once, if the whole were not properly cleaned out. This has been done, the wooden panels taken down and the walls behind washed with aqua fortis, every room fresh papered and varnished; the worst was I had to go to an hotel, for the smell was so strong. It is still like autumn here, no snow, no frost, but sitting still at work I use a good deal of wood. I have put up a stove, for the open fire is only for ornament. The season is nearly at an end, I have been out a good deal, as I have made many acquaintances; one goes at nine and is home by eleven, unless there is dancing, when one is home at one o’clock. It is not very amusing, and there is nothing to eat, only tea and cake and a little coloured water, and it does not pay for one’s gloves. I did not have a doctor when I was ill, or any servant, though many days I was almost starved, for if I wanted anything I had to go out and fetch it myself. I have lately made friends with an Indian here, with whom I practise talking English and Bengali. I had already studied the latter, and have prepared a Bengali Grammar in French, but as yet I have not found a publisher. As to my plans, they are pretty nearly settled. For London and Berlin I have not money enough, and I had a most friendly letter from Bopp, in which he openly said that all he might be able to do for me in Berlin was to find money enough to publish extracts from the great Commentary. Then came a letter from Boehdtingk from Petersburg, requiring a definite answer to lay before the Academy. I should find there the means to print with Boehtlingk the text and Commentary. He writes that if I first took a post as private tutor, which he had found a good plan, some place under Government might be found for me. The Academy had sent for MSS. from India for the work; in fact everything, with one or two exceptions, seems so promising that I have decided to go there. I shall find six Sanskritists in Petersburg, of whom I know two, who write to me that they lead a very pleasant and busy life there. I have asked (for Russians are not to be trusted) for a written transcript of the decree of the Academy, and shall not start until I have received it. I don't know how much longer I shall be in Paris. But I must know how my money matters stand; I don't know how much money I have left. If the Petersburg plan succeeds I need trouble no one, but if I return to Berlin, which Bopp advised, I must borrow some money and start as a tutor (Privatdocent). I cannot say how I long to go to London, but I cannot manage it. When the Petersburg plan is settled I will write to the Duchess<sup>1</sup> for introductions, for they are of great use in Russia. I went to the Theatre the other night and saw an operetta, the Domino Noir; then, on Emilie's recommendation, I went to the Masked Ball at the Opera House; it was odious, vulgar people, wretched dresses, noise, tumult, and horrible atmosphere, and at the end every one was drunk. I shall never go again. The music was excellent. I am busy learning Italian with my Italian Sanskritist, an Abbé, who is longing to convert me. Burnouf I see often, and he is very good to me. I wonder where I shall pitch my tent.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

PARIS, Easter, 1846.

'Now I must tell you about Petersburg. I received another letter (they each cost five francs), to say that the cost of printing was provided for, and enclosing a copy of the procès-verbal of the Meeting of the Academy. It ran thus: "Monsieur Boehtlingk, Member of the Academy, will publish conjointly with Monsieur Müller of Paris the Veda," &c. At the same time I was asked if I would take a place in the Museum of the Academy, rooms and firing, and 1,200 francs a year pay; of course I had to decide at once, and had many points to consider. First, I did not approve of conjointly, and I was afraid from what I was told of St. Petersburg, that if I was once there conjointly would turn out to be something very different. Boehtlingk has again quarrelled with Bopp, and does not seem dependable, so that Burnouf and all other Sanskritists advised me to give it up. As to the place at the Museum, Boehtlingk had already written to me that I could not live on the pay, and must give private lessons, so that a great deal of time must be sacrificed to earning my bread. And after all one goes to Russia if one must, but then one must sell oneself as dear as possible, and I could see that a long stay there would in itself cut me off from a return to Germany. If one has the good luck to be born in Germany, or any other civilized country, one ought not lightly to throw away this blessing, and the satisfying quiet life of a German Professor outweighs with me a Russian Privy Councillorship, with all its orders and titles. So I wrote I could not take such a post, and that as far as printing the Veda was concerned, I kept to my earlier written conditions, the acceptance of which the Academy must send direct to me in writing, using my own words. I am pretty certain this will not be done, but that is no matter, for I have just had a letter from a bookseller, Samter in Königsberg, who has set up a Sanskrit printing office, and who will print my whole work, and if possible pay me something for it. This must depend upon subscriptions, which he would open, so that I should gain my point in Germany. And now I will honestly confess I long for quiet and for home; and a life in Russia, so forsaken of God and man, would be a terrible sacrifice on my part, which one must be ready to make for science and personal usefulness, but which one need not exactly seek out.'

<sup>1</sup> Of Anhalt Dessau.

It was necessary to give these letters in extenso, as in 1891 Boehtlingk attacked Max Müller and accused him of having behaved at this time discourteously towards (d'avoir brusqué) the Academy of St. Petersburg. From the first, Burnouf and Goldstücker warned Max Müller against accepting any offer from Boehtlingk, but, despairing of other means of getting the Veda printed, he was ready to close with the offer on condition that some provision was secured for him whilst he was working with Boehtlingk. The latter seems to have first proposed to the Academy that they should buy the MSS. and materials which Max Müller had collected for his Vedic work, after they had been sent to St. Petersburg for inspection, and that the post of Assistant Keeper of the St. Petersburg Museum should be given him; but Boehtlingk says his colleagues demurred, and kindly adds the reason, 'because so young and unknown a person could not be safely trusted with the custody of the treasures of the Museum.' One cannot but wonder with what sort of men they had lived ! All the correspondence carried on was with Boehtlingk, not with the Academy, which never made Max Müller a definite offer. How then could he have been discourteous to the Academy ? The conditions he made were that the Academy should give him in writing an undertaking to complete the work of bringing out the Rig-veda. No doubt this condition was suggested by the distrust which Burnouf and others felt about the whole matter. The Academy would not accept this condition, and there the matter broke off. One fails to see why Boehtlingk was so angry with Max Müller for not telling him he had received an offer from a German bookseller to publish the Rig-veda by subscription, after he had stated to the Academy the conditions on which he could join Boehtlingk, and which the Academy rejected. As in his subsequent attack (Max Müller als Mythen-Dichter), Boehtlingk is most anxious to prove that ‘under the Petersburg Academy only the representative of Sanskrit in the Academy could be meant’; one could understand his feeling personally disappointed, but one fails again to see any insult to the Academy in proposing the conditions named above. Is it not rather the other way ? The Academy, according to Boehtlingk, refused to place in the Museum a man trusted and admired by Humboldt, Bopp, Brockhaus, and Burnouf. If ‘the Academy’ meant ‘only the representative of Sanskrit in that body,’ Max Müller, after this curious refusal, was right to follow the advice of Burnouf and Goldstücker, and have nothing more to do with him. ‘Burnouf repeatedly warned me against Boehtlingk, and promised if I would only stay in Paris to give me his support with Guizot,’ says the Autobiography. Boehtlingk boasts in his attack on Max Müller that he had prevented his ever being made a Correspondent of the Academy of St. Petersburg, and it has the distinction of being the only Society of real note throughout Europe where his name does not appear. When Boehtlingk’s attack came out in 1891 Max Müller wrote to the Secretary of the Academy giving an explanation. The Secretary wrote the following answer :—

‘N’ayant pu porter à la connaissance de la Conférence de l’Aca-

démie que lors de la réouverture de ses séances votre honorée lettre et votre memorandum, qui me sont parvenus en été, je suis chargé par la Conférence de vous informer, Monsieur, que la brochure de Mr. Böhtlingk a été publiée personnellement par lui sans le concours de l'Académie en quoi que cela soit, et l'auteur n'a même fait aucune communication à l'Académie par rapport à cette publication, ni avant, ni après son impression, de sorte que l'Académie ne se trouve en rien solidaire avec les opinions émises par Mr. Böhtlingk. D'autre part, l'Académie, n'ayant à son grand regret jamais eu l'occasion d'entrer en relations directes avec vous, honoré Monsieur, il ne peut même pas être question de mésentendu entre la Conférence de l'Académie et l'illustre sanscritologue, que notre Académie apprécie à sa juste valeur.

‘Veuillez agréer, honoré Monsieur, l'assurance de mes sentiments les plus distingués.

LE SECRÉTAIRE PERPÉTUEL.’

The whole of this affair is well summed up by an Englishman, a good German scholar, who has carefully examined all Boehtlingk's letters. ‘It is clear that Max Müller had come to no agreement with Boehtlingk. The risks incurred by a young scholar going to St. Petersburg without some assured means of livelihood were obviously considerable, and Max Müller evidently regarded these as a last resource. After the warnings he had received, he was certainly not to be blamed for asking Boehtlingk, before he agreed to go, for a guarantee that the edition should be completed. This quite reasonable request was refused, and the project consequently came to an end. During the negotiations Max Müller was perfectly justified in continuing to look out for a publisher in Germany, or England, who would offer him more advantageous conditions. Boehtlingk's assumption that his own plan would be carried out was premature, and he had begun collating MSS. of the text of the Rig-veda before any bargain had been concluded with Max Müller. Boehtlingk had not originally meant to edit the Rig-veda, but after he had taken the matter in hand, he was evidently annoyed at having gone so far himself when the negotiations came to an end, representing the request for a guarantee of completion as a slight to the Academy. It was only natural that Max Müller should have wished to publish the whole work himself, if he could obtain the means of doing so. He entertained the idea of collaboration only because compelled to do so by circumstances.' Dr. Boehtlingk made his attack in 1891 when he was in friendly correspondence with Professor Max Müller, and did not even send him a copy of his pamphlet. He had destroyed all Max Müller's letters in 1868, his own letters exist, and by no means bear out Boehtlingk's version of the whole affair, which was drawn from an unsound and somewhat tainted memory.

A month later than the last letter to his mother, Max Müller found that he had saved enough money for a short visit to England, and the next letter speaks of his happy prospects.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

PARIS, May 24.

'My prospects in London are good, and everything well arranged. I cannot state when I go, as I expect a letter from Hagedorn about his rooms, which should arrive on the 7th. Then I go straight to London. Baron von Cetto has written to me three times from there with new proposals. Perhaps I shall give private lessons, but am sure to make a little money by Sanskrit commissions. The prospectus for my work will be published in London in five languages, German, English, French, Bengali, and Sanskrit. It will be printed in Königsberg. A few days ago I received offers of support from the German Oriental Society, of which I am a member, as well as from the Société Asiatique in Paris. They offered money towards printing, and as this is no longer needed, I hope to have something for myself. I have written to Humboldt. Burnouf has done so too, and Dr. Goldstücker hopes to see him about it in Berlin. I am rejoiced at going to London, and shall stay as long as I can. But whatever happens I will not stay away another whole year without once seeing you, were it but for an hour. In all that I think and do I remember you always, my dear mother, and it is my greatest joy to be any pleasure to you. I need only patience and courage! One must bend or break, and perhaps we shall find a pleasanter corner than St. Petersburg in which to spend the next twenty-five years. Your MAX.'

He went for three weeks, and lived in England above fifty-four years.

CHAPTER IV

1846-1847

London. W. H. Russell. Bunsen. Visit to Germany. East India Company and the Rig-veda. British Association.

Translation.

46, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, LONDON,

June 13, 1846.

‘MY DEAR MOTHER,—Here I am really in London; but I hardly know how to write, my heart is so full of all I have heard and seen. So I will only say, I arrived safe without being swallowed up by the world-encompassing ocean. I left Paris on the 9th, at 5 p.m., by diligence. I had met with such kindness on all sides, and had so many invitations, that it was difficult to get away. My neighbours at table gave me a dinner, so did the Marrins, Burnouf, Countess Berthöer, whom I do not think I have mentioned to you. She is a young and very agreeable woman, whose husband was killed eight months ago in Algiers. She was for some time in India, and is very musical, and we have played and smoked a great deal together. Many friends came with me to the post-house, and I drove away with rather a heavy heart. I had many expenses those last days, and I am all the more grateful for the thirty thalers you put up with the shirts; the orange sugar was confiscated on the frontier—which will make you very angry, as it made me. So I left Paris, travelled the whole night, and arrived at 11 a.m. in Boulogne. At last from far off I saw the dancing, widespread sea, and I had hardly patience to get down at the hotel, but set off at once for a walk along the shore. You know that no words can describe its wondrous beauty. I wandered about for five hours, till I was forced to return to the hotel from sheer hunger. At ten at night I went on board a ship, bound direct for London. It was almost full moon, and the sea was smooth and beautiful, and except for a short time of misery I really enjoyed it. We got into the Thames early in the morning; and you can have no idea of the life and traffic. The river was alive with ships, among them huge three-masted vessels. Thus we reached the Custom House, where all my books and papers were turned out. I took a cab, and looked for lodgings, which I soon found in a pleasant, respectable street. I have a room on the first floor, looking on the street, for which I pay 10s. a week. The house belongs to a tailor, and as yet I am fairly comfortable. In the morning I make my tea, and dine at four or five o'clock for 1s. 6d. I have been running about paying visits, but found hardly any one at home. To-morrow I shall call at Bunsen's and on Baron von Cetto. To-day I went to the East India House, where Wilson was very kind, and invited me to dinner. I have been to the British Museum, and made some pleasant acquaintances. Now I have my MSS. at home, and am happily settled in quiet to work. I shall do all I can to give private lessons, for German money does not go far here. I always hope for the best, and I shall manage. Only think that I am in London, that I have seen Hyde Park, St. James's Palace, St. Paul's, Westminster, and the Tower! It seems to me impossible, and I am most fortunate; how well all goes with me, how far beyond all I deserve! Write to me soon; that is the one thing left to wish for. Life here is very wonderful, and so different from Paris. I find the language very difficult, but I shall soon manage it. Yesterday evening I spent with an Englishman, a reporter for the Times, whose acquaintance I have made, and who has already been most helpful and kind to me. I am so tired with running about that I am nearly asleep, and don't know whether you can read my scrawl.

'Your M.'

It will be seen by the above letter that Max Müller did not enter into all details in writing to his mother. The life was so different to anything to which she was accustomed, and required so much explanation, that we often find him passing over things well known to his friends on the spot. He does not recount above his first meeting with his kind friend and benefactor, the famous Times correspondent, Dr. now Sir William Russell, whose own pen shall describe the event:—

202, CROMWELL ROAD, S.W.,
October 8, 1901.

'DEAR MRS. MAX MÜLLER,—My daughter is writing for me; I have to use her pen, conscious that I have too long delayed fulfilling the promise I made to recall the incidents connected with my first acquaintance with my ever dear friend, your husband.

‘Early in June, 1846, I was in France, and was summoned back to take charge of the Parliamentary Committee on Railway Bills. I took my passage on board a steamer which went direct from Boulogne to London, landing passengers at the Custom House above Blackwall. I distinctly remember the interest I took in a young man, a little younger than myself, who was very anxious to ascertain the names of the places on the river which the steamer passed on her way from the Downs up to the Docks. He was evidently a foreigner, and had some difficulty in making himself understood by the mate, who appeared to have him in charge. I had observed him during a rather rough passage seated on the deck and holding on by one of the stays, evidently engaged in a contest with the advanced posts of mal de mer, but he resisted stoutly, and by the time we entered smooth water he was conqueror. He was neatly and carefully dressed in a suit which showed his erect, slight, but well-built figure to advantage; the expression of his face was most engaging, regular features, fine intelligent eyes, no trace of whiskers, beard, or moustache, but thick dark hair under his felt hat; an alert air and penetrating looks. Some casual question which he addressed to one of the passengers produced a very misleading answer, and I ventured to give the true explanation of the vessels which were moored in the Downs, waiting for favourable wind or tide. The melancholy look which had attracted my attention when we were in mid-channel as he sat holding on to a rope had vanished; there was something to look at and to inquire about. Soon we became on good terms, and he told me that he was going to England to pursue his labours in Oriental literature; whilst I informed him that I was a law student residing in the Middle Temple. At the Custom House there was, I remember, some trouble about passports, and my companion produced a paper in which his name was set forth as Max Müller—an official document which satisfied the authorities. But he was soon in much distress; his portmanteau could not be found; he told me it contained all his worldly goods, with his letters and papers, and that it would be ruin to him if it were not forthcoming. All the passengers’ luggage was overhauled, and still not a trace of the missing trunk. My newly made friend was in serious anxiety, and I felt for him deeply. What could he do? an utter stranger with very little money about him, almost all he possessed being in the unfortunate box that could not be found. The Custom House people having cleared all the baggage, were anxious to clear us out; so I told my young friend that I had chambers where I would be most happy to give him a shake-down for the night, and on the following day he could go back to the Custom House and see if the missing box had been landed. He was very much moved, and accepted my proposal with a charming cordiality. We drove together to the Temple, and despite his anxiety the strange new sights filled him with the greatest interest. We dined at Anderton's in Fleet Street, and when we got back to the Temple we found that the laundress had arranged a comfortable couch for him, and had laid out a sleeping-suit for the stranger. Next day we made a journey to the Custom House, and to his inexpressible joy Max Müller was shown his treasured portmanteau, which he opened for examination, and then saw passed, with the traditional chalk-mark on it, to the cab and carried to my rooms. I think it was that day that I went out with him, at his request, and found a decent bedroom in Essex Street, close by, of which he became the tenant, and where he had his breakfast every morning. Max Müller had letters for Professors at King's College, the Prussian Embassy, &c., and he was soon in communication with some of them; but I saw him every day I should think for two or three months, and every hour I did so increased my regard for him—so simple, so straight, and so learned; kindly and grave, but with a keen sense of humour, and a most bright and joyous disposition. In those days gentlemen of the press were more in favour with the dramatic world than they are at present. I could always obtain free admissions to concerts and theatres, and so we went together night after night to Drury Lane, Her Majesty's, the Haymarket, Adelphi, and so forth; and Max's enjoyment of the Opera was intense and delightful. It was the custom at that time for students after dining in hall (at the Temple) to go off to their rooms with a friend or two, and others dropped in. Max Müller was always the most welcome guest at mine, and he provided strange and wonderful entertainment for the company. For the first time the Temple was enlivened by the strains of "Edite, bibite, conviviales," "Crambambuli," and other Studenten-Lieder. One morceau of surpassing excellence, as we all thought, we always encored, and Max smilingly complied<sup>1</sup>. It was an imitation of a whole orchestra—trumpets, drums, bassoons, and goodness knows what besides!—delivered with the greatest precision. Those of the company who had rooms in the Temple were eager to secure a special right for this diversion. There are, as far as I know, none of these now alive. At last Max went away, but whether back to Germany or to Oxford I cannot remember. In the winter I was dispatched on a special commission in relation to the famine in Ireland, and whilst there I received a letter from Max, written in a hand I could not read then, but which I made out later, in which he told me of his projects; but I did not see him again till I visited Oxford in 1848. He had established himself at Oxford, and had already gained the position there due to his character and acquirements. Then came the revolutions in Europe, ample employment for me in all quarters, so that for a good many years there could be but very short and accidental snatches of intercourse between us ; but I heard of his rising fame with great satisfaction. After the Crimean War I delivered a series of lectures at various towns in England, and a visit to Oxford enabled me to renew an acquaintance always delightful and dear to me ; and after I returned from India in 1859 we met several times, and engaged in correspondence concerning my experience of a country in which he was deeply interested. And now I think I may make a jump to 1870 and the war with France, when as soon as I came home we had frequent meetings ; and the only cloud that ever obscured the warmth and brightness of our intercourse arose from a discussion caused by an intemperate objection I made to the opinions he expressed about the great Bismarck, then the god of the people who worshipped success all over the world. You know what happiness it was to me to make a descent upon Oxford, and spend a few days under your roof at 7, Norham Gardens, and how my wife entered fully into the great repose and comfort we enjoyed there. I shall say no more, except that I reckon your husband's friendship one of my greatest treasures, and that I shall lament his loss as long as I live.

<sup>1</sup> 'O Tannenbaum! o Tannenbaum!'

'I am sorry to send you such a bald account, but my memory of late has melted—it is without form and void.

'Yours very truly and with great regard,

'W. H. RUSSELL.'

Max Müller had been in correspondence whilst in Paris with Professor Wilson, the Librarian of the East India House, so there was no difficulty about borrowing MSS. and beginning work at once. The following letter to his mother mentions the momentous visit to Bunsen which determined the whole course of his life :—

Translation.

3, WARDROBE PLACE, DOCTORS' COMMONS,

July 13, 1846.

'I have only time to tell you that all goes well with me here, that Bunsen has received me in the most friendly way as the son of his friend, and has promised me his fatherly support in every way possible. I have therefore explained my exact position to him, that my work, which interests him very much, makes a long stay in London absolutely necessary, and he assures me I have found a friend in him, who will care for me as a father for his son. I stayed two days in the country with him. His family are very pleasant and cultivated. One evening I went to a party where were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Jerusalem, and others of the haute volée. He is himself a very clever man, and a great favourite here, and perhaps he may find something for me. I do my best too with Wilson, but I can't do much, for I must first master the language. I have already changed my room, because it was not clean and so hot. I am not satisfied here, and must pay 10s. weekly. I have signed the contract with my publisher; the prospectus will be out November 1, and then also the Meghadûta, and I hope at Easter a thick volume of Sanskrit.'

Of Max Müller's first visit to the Prussian Legation Mme. Ernest de Bunsen writes:—

'I remember the Professor on the morning of his arrival when he joined the family party at No. 4, Carlton Terrace. The Legation was then in full swing, and Baron Bunsen and the Professor were absorbed in one another independently of our home party. I value my vivid remembrance of his first appearance, for we were astonished at his youth and cheerfulness, and immediately he gained a place amongst us.'

Max Müller had not been long in London before he wrote to acquaint his friend and teacher Burnouf with his prospects. After thanking him for his friendly counsel and encouragement, and the loan of his valuable MSS., which had helped him to continue his work when he was almost in despair, a work which he now hoped to be able to carry through and make of use to science, he adds:—

Translation.

'I never can forget all I owe to you. As to my stay in London, I am on the whole thoroughly satisfied with it. The MSS. are splendid, but in such masses that to copy all that concerns the Veda and my work would take at least two or three years of merely mechanical labour. So I must stay in England, and with the MSS. at hand bring out the Veda and its Commentary. I shall do this if I can possibly, by private lessons and copying MSS., make enough to face the great expense of life here. I hope that in this way it will be possible for me to carry out the work in a shorter time than I at first expected. I do not deny that it is perhaps foolish to make such a sacrifice, and lead this anxious life for another five years without doing anything that can secure a settled post; but as I have once begun the work it must be finished, and I see no other way of doing it. Professor Wilson is most friendly, and I meet him constantly either at his own house or in the Library of the East India House.'

Burnouf replied that he thought his plans excellent, and that those who understood the magnitude of the task Max Müller had undertaken and the wealth of materials for it in London, would consider that he must work very fast, if he only stayed four years. 'Mr. Wilson will indirectly render a great service to Indian letters, if, with the benevolent liberality with which he meets all those who ask his support, he makes it possible for you to stay in London as long as the task of publishing your Rig-veda with its commentaries and indispensable indices may require.'

To his mother he writes:—

Translation.

LONDON, August 3, 1846.

'I had meant to write sooner, but I have been so busy. I am between two fires, or rather Ministers, for the Bavarian Minister, Baron von Cetto, has made fresh offers to me which are tolerably advantageous—1,000 thalers a year and free board; so that I could have put by 600 thalers, and later he would recommend me for some place in Bavaria. On the other hand Bunsen advised me strongly to decline this offer, taking on himself all the responsibility, and told me to trust myself absolutely to him. He is really marvellously kind to me, and I am constantly in his house, early, late, and to dinner. I have not quite decided, and want to postpone a decision. Bunsen is so much interested in the publication of the Veda, which falls in with his own studies, and he urges me first to print some of it. I shall do so as soon as I can, but have still a great deal to do to it. Wilson too is very helpful, and promises to do all he can to get me some place in England, which is the height of my ambition; but that may take years, and meantime how shall I eat and drink? Bunsen sent me an article from the Augsburger Zeitung with the heading "Max Müller"; if you have not seen it, get it, and I think even you will be satisfied! Of London I can tell you little, except that last Saturday I saw its full splendour. A friend took me to the Italian Opera, which I had not yet seen either here or in Paris. It was wonderful. A larger house than I have ever seen, and every one in full dress. The boxes filled with the nobility, and I saw Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, the Duke of Cambridge, &c. The music absolutely perfect; Anna Bolena, sung by Grisi, Mario, and Lablache; all the highest artistic perfection. And then a ballet to which there can be nothing equal, the Jugement de Paris with Taglioni, Grahn, and Cerito as the three goddesses. The decorations were beautiful. The stalls cost 7s. 6d. The same friend asked me to go with him to Scotland as his guest, but I cannot, gladly as I would do so. So you see your son is still afloat, and everywhere friendly hands are stretched out to help him on his way.

‘Your MAX.’

Translation.

August 28.

‘DEAREST MOTHER,—I have been able to arrange that your letters<sup>1</sup> may come by messenger. They leave Berlin every Tuesday, and you must send them to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs under Bunsen’s address. The letters leave here to-day and reach Berlin in five days, and Chemnitz therefore in six.’

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

August 25, 1846.

‘All goes tolerably well with me. My work gets on. Bunsen is wonderfully good to me. I dine there once or twice every week, and he always gives me fresh courage and hope. When my first volume is out he hopes to get a salary for me from the Prussian Government. I must stay in England till the whole work is finished, and that will be five years. If I should then return to Germany is the question, for I am so delighted with this country. I could willingly live here always, if only a place could be found for me. But those are future plans which do not trouble me much now; at all events I feel nearer my haven here, if only my pilot holds out! To-morrow I am again invited to Bunsen’s for his birthday. Professor Lepsius from Berlin is now staying at Bunsen’s with his young wife; he owes everything to Bunsen. He got him a Stipendium to study, then to go to Italy, France, and England, and at last to Egypt; and now he is Professor at Berlin, with 1,500 thalers a year. I have become acquainted with Archdeacon Hare, and dined with him. He is a very kind old man, and I am on most happy terms with him. I am still in Wardrobe Place, and more comfortable, as I can dine in the house with one of the other lodgers; very good, and only 1s. He is a young German bookseller, married to an Englishwoman, with whom I can talk English, which is already much easier to me. I have not seen much more of London; the city is less interesting than the people and the life. I am well and don’t feel anything of the spleen to which I am naturally inclined. I read the Times every day with great interest, while I drink my tea and smoke a pipe, and then to work. The one thing I long for is quiet and a certainty, and a pleasant home life with my dear mother. But as often as I think it is near at hand it goes again, and who knows when I may at last gain it? My work is full of interest, and keeps me straight; but sometimes one longs for more in life than this everlasting struggle. Now only quiet and content!’

<sup>1</sup> He had to pay 1s. 6d. in England for letters on which his mother had already paid something.

In September Max Müller issued a prospectus of the Rig-veda to be published, as has been seen, by subscription by Samter of Königsberg. This plan was given up when the East India Company undertook the publication of the Rig-veda. The prospectus contains a proposal for a German translation, and sets forth clearly the importance of the Rig-veda for the history of human thought. Soon after, he heard of the very alarming illness of his mother, and his ever faithful friend Bunsen sent him with dispatches to Berlin, to enable him to see her. Such was his anxiety to reach his mother, that he insisted on crossing, though it was a frightful storm and he was the only passenger. It took nearly six hours to get to Calais! He was able to spend several weeks with her, and returned by Berlin.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

BERLIN, October 27.

‘Your letter which I got yesterday was a great pleasure, though it made me sad, when I saw how my leaving you had excited and weakened you. Now I hope, if you really love me, you will think of your health, and spare yourself as much as possible. Remember the distance is not so very great, and that we can reach each other now so easily; think too that it is of great importance and use to me, and that in after years we shall find a rich reward for it. There is not much to tell you of my journey. . . . I arrived early in Leipzig, and went straight to Victor Carus. I went also to Brockhaus, with whom I had much to talk over, and then on to Dessau. Here they were all very well, and glad to get a better account of you. That evening I had to go with them to the theatre, and there the Duchess saw me, and the next morning commanded me to the Schloss. She was exceedingly friendly, and kept me nearly an hour. . . . She then gave me a letter of introduction to Prince Waldemar in Berlin. I have been to Bopp and Lepsius, and have still to call on Humboldt, Schelling, &c. . . . There was a large party here last night . . . where I met many interesting people. I shall be glad when I am quietly back in London.

‘Your MAX.’

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

BERLIN, November 11.

‘You will be surprised at getting another letter from Berlin, when I hoped to be already in London. But there was so much to do of real importance concerning my work and prospects that I was obliged to put off my journey, and cannot even now fix the day. The worst is I have had no rest the whole time, always running about, paying visits to Geheimräthe and Ministers. Humboldt has again been most good to me, and done all he could to support the publication of the Veda, in such a way that I should gain something by it. He gave my prospectus to the King, who had it read out to him, and spoke most graciously about it, and sent me word through Humboldt I should write him a letter regarding the religious importance of the Veda. I had to do this at once, and you know how much care and time such a thing takes. The King is unfortunately not in Berlin, but has received my letter, and already promised a considerable sum towards the undertaking. Then there was much to arrange about the Sanskrit types, which belong to the Academy, but I am in great hopes that my plans will be successful, and that I can return to London in good spirits. . . . I dined with Prince Waldemar, who is a remarkably charming and cultivated man. After dinner we had coffee in an Indian tent, with fine carpets and tiger-skins, everything Indian, even to the long pipes and tobacco.’

Soon after his return to London the negotiations with the East India Company for printing and publishing the Rig-veda began. The success of his plan of publishing the Veda in Königsberg depended on the support of the East India Company—who were asked to subscribe for 100 copies, the King of Prussia and the French Government having already promised to take a large number. But when, as advised by Bunsen and Wilson, Max Müller called on the various Directors on the subject, they declared themselves averse to supporting a work carried out by a foreign country. Bunsen was ready to seize the opportunity, for he saw at once that the East India Company was the proper body to undertake the whole work.

‘It was not an easy task,’ says the Autobiography, ‘to persuade the Board of Directors, all strictly practical men, to authorize so considerable an expenditure, merely to edit and print an old book that none of them could understand, and many of them had never even heard of. Bunsen pointed out what a disgrace it would be if some other country than England published this edition of the Sacred Books of the Brâhmans.'

Professor Wilson, the Librarian of the India House, who had long been preparing a translation of the Rig-veda and often found himself hampered from want of a perfectly correct text, added his powerful advocacy, and though months of uncertainty were yet to try the young scholar, everything was finally arranged by April, 1847.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

LONDON, December 25.

'I put off writing, for I hoped to give you news of employment, about which I have been busy ever since the end of November, and in constant hopes of a favourable decision, but I am still without any definite information. I can hardly tell you how uncomfortable such a position is, such uncertainty makes me unfit for anything. I can truly say I have lost the whole of December, as I could do nothing but write official letters to the Honourable Court of Directors of the East India Company, and pay official visits, &c. But if it succeeds, I shall have £150 a year, and nothing to do but bring out a Sanskrit work for the Company. You can imagine how delightful such a position would be, and can picture to yourself my intense anxiety as to yes or no! Bunsen and Wilson have done all in their power, and Bunsen especially has taken the liveliest interest in the whole affair, but such arrangements cannot be made in a hurry, and so I must be patient. My birthday passed by quietly, with no one who knew it. I dined at Bunsen's. The whole month has gone in hopes, expectations, disappointments, and rejoicings, and though it is possible I might hear to-day that all is settled, it may dawdle on into next year, and even fail entirely. So do not talk about it, and do not paint my future to yourself in rosy colours, for it may first be very grey! I feel sure I can depend on Bunsen under all circumstances. How I have deserved his kindness, I know not, for he has done me so many kindnesses, not only where his position made it easy for him, but even when it was disagreeable to him, and required great self-restraint. I was there for Christmas Eve. The whole family were together, children and children's children—in all thirty people, and then all the servants. A huge Christmas tree, and two large rooms lighted up and decorated, and presents for every one. I had a beautiful writing portfolio fitted up with everything; I was as happy as one can be when obliged to be away from home. We have been waiting five days for the courier, who comes by Hamburg, and is probably frozen in! From January 1, a letter to Germany will only cost one shilling. To-day I dine with Wilson—a large party. The English keep Christmas by eating enormously, but one needs an English appetite for it! . . . I have forgotten to send my New Year's wishes—you know how I wish you all with all my heart a very happy year—and no year will be happier for me than the one when I find myself able, if only in the smallest degree, to add to your comfort!—Max.'

His life all these months had been one of very hard work and constant self-denial, and but for Bunsen's substantial help he could not have lived on in England. He tells us how he walked to and from the India House every day, his arms full of books and papers. One day he left his spectacles, which he had broken, to be mended at a shop in the Strand, and on calling to fetch them, he laid down a sovereign to pay for them. The shopman returned him change for half a sovereign, and persisted that Max Müller had only given him ten shillings. It was in vain to remonstrate, the man only became abusive to the unmistakable foreigner in a well-worn coat, and Max left the shop, sadly aware that the missing ten shillings represented several dinners, which he must give up. Some days passed, dinnerless, when one evening the man rushed out of the same shop as Max was passing it, with ten shillings in his hand, which he held out to him—'Oh, sir,' he said, 'I have watched for you several days. You were right; I found I had ten shillings too much when I counted up my money that evening, and I have longed to get it back to you,' adding, 'for you look as if you wanted it.'

Meantime he was making friends in England. He had stayed more than once in the country at Totteridge with Bunsen, and with him had visited Archdeacon Hare. Mr. Vaux of the British Museum had become a fast friend, an intimacy which lasted till Mr. Vaux's death. Max Müller constantly attended the suppers given by his friend, where the invitation cards were adorned with pictures of Nineveh bulls and hawk-headed deities, and where clouds of not over-good tobacco smoke filled the air. 'Billy Russell,' as we know, constantly sent him tickets for concerts and theatres, so that, notwithstanding his hard work, and the uncertainty about the Veda, his early London life was far more enjoyable than the first year of his stay in Paris. There were several young German Sanskritists at work in England, and with these and the colony of German merchants, living chiefly at Denmark Hill, and the members of the German Consulate he was in constant intercourse.

Early in 1847 he went for a short time to Oxford to copy Sanskrit MSS.—his first sight of his future home. About the same time he made acquaintance by letter with Benfey, the great Sanskrit scholar at Göttingen, an acquaintance that soon ripened into a true friendship. Benfey was then engaged on his edition of the Sâma-veda, and many letters passed between the friends on points of Vedic grammar.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

LONDON, February 12, 1847.

‘Still in great uncertainty. I have only just returned to London, for I have been staying at Oxford, working in the Library there, and have thus seen the most interesting and beautiful city in Europe. The whole town is of the Middle Ages, and consists almost entirely of churches, monasteries (now Colleges), castles, and towers, all in old English or Gothic, and the whole life is of the Middle Ages. All students in black and white gowns and black caps, and so are the Professors, &c. And then the wealth and easy life in the Universities (sic), which are more High Schools than Universities.’

Not long after Max Müller’s return from Oxford he was able to write to his mother:—

Translation.

5, NEWMAN’S ROW, LINCOLN’S INN FIELDS,

April 15, 1847.

‘At last the long conflict is decided, and I have carried off, so to speak, the prize! I can yet hardly believe that I have at last got what I have struggled for so long, entire independence, and I am filled with the thought of how much more I have gained than I deserve. . . . I am to hand over to the Company, ready for press, fifty sheets each year—the same I had promised to Samter in Germany; for this I have asked £200 a year, £4 a sheet. They have been considering the matter since December, and it was only yesterday that it was officially settled. I have to read the corrections, and shall have plenty of time left to devote to my studies. . . . As the work will be above 400 sheets, I have a certain position for the next eight years, and the work is really so light I could take another post with it. This in fact has been already offered me, i.e. a place as Librarian at the British Museum, with £150 a year. But on Bunsen's advice I have refused this, as I would rather be free the first years to study, till something more suitable presents itself, of which there is little doubt in time. And now what do you say, dearest mother? Is it not more than I could have ever expected? And have I not been right throughout to hold out to the very last, and devote all my time and strength and money to one aim, and pursue that to the last gasp? But only think that I had not a penny left, and that in spite of every effort to make a little money, I should have had to return to Germany had not Bunsen stood by me and helped me by word and deed. It has been a bad time, and now that it is over I may say so. I saw that the turning-point of my life had come, and that after all the uncertainty I was only a few steps from the goal, and yet I was not in a position to wait longer, but should be forced to return to Germany, to give up my favourite studies, if not entirely, yet mostly, in order to gain a scanty living at a school or by private lessons. I knew that none of my relations and friends agreed with me; on the contrary, that they all thought my plans foolish and exaggerated, and I had no one from whom I could expect support—I mean, who would have lent me a small sum for a few years. In fact, all my time, money, and work, indeed my whole life perhaps, would have been sacrificed and lost, had not Bunsen, who had once been in the same position, without my saying anything to him, stood by me, and in this way made it possible for me to struggle on with joyful confidence and firm faith towards the goal I had set before me. I do not know whether I should thank God more that I have at last attained my long-desired and long-sought object, or that I have gained the friendship of so noble and distinguished a man as Bunsen. It is in these last weeks that I have learned to know and value him so thoroughly. Archdeacon Hare invited Bunsen and me to spend Easter with him in the country, and so I spent the whole time in constant intercourse and conversation with these two men and Sir John Herschell, the famous astronomer, who was there on a visit, and thus I forgot all my troubles. In fact, I spent a delightful time, and when I reached London yesterday I found all settled, and I could say and feel, Thank God! Now I must at once send my thanks, and set to work to earn the first £100. Till then Bunsen will lend me some money, which will not be necessary later on, as one can live here comfortably on £150, and at first my expenses will be small. We will not make any plans yet for the future. When my work is once arranged I can easily spend a month or two each year in Germany, and when I have put by a little you might try if you could live comfortably in England. But at first, patience! My rooms here are small, but very nice—sitting- and bed-room—with a beautiful view over an old park and Gothic buildings. I pay, however, nearly £45, and that is cheap. As soon as I have earned a little money, my first purchase will be a piano—hiring is almost as dear as buying a second-hand one, which is always easy to find. What did you think of my Meghadûta? I am well and happy.'

This summer Max mentions hearing Mendelssohn several times, both in public and at Bunsen's. It was his last intercourse with the friend of his childhood, boyhood, and youth; for at the close of the year he writes:—

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

I, GARDEN PLACE, December 11.

'The death of Mendelssohn was a great shock to me, and yet is not his lot to be envied? and if to live is to work, has he not lived longer than many? What comes from God is right and good. How beautifully Jean Paul speaks of comfort, but how much more beautiful and elevating is another book, which unhappily through man's unreason and man's wisdom is so spoilt for us from childhood, that we can only slowly and by degrees read and live into it again. Here the general sympathy has been expressed in so many different ways. Elijah was twice performed, all in mourning, no applause, and at the beginning the Dead March in Saul. I could not go, it was too much for me. I could not at first touch the piano. Now there is a collection for a monument, probably in Westminster, where you know Handel is buried.'

To return to his daily life, now given up to the preparation of the text and Commentary of the Rig-veda. The MS. of the first volume was rapidly approaching completion. 'I get up at five every morning,' he says (May 10), 'for I have a great deal to do, and the evenings are generally wasted in society. Summer is beginning, and there is more green each morning on the great trees before my window.'

For nearly four years Max Müller had been copying and collating the MSS. of the Rig-veda in order to publish a correct text, but this was by no means the most difficult part of his task, though it is the part that has been best understood and appreciated by the public. Real Sanskrit scholars know that his knowledge of Sanskrit was tested and shown in the critical edition of Sâyana's Commentary. This work involved enormous labour, and he was often urged to work faster and less critically, but he kept to his first resolution, to publish the whole text of the Commentary, making it as perfect as possible. At the time he began his edition, many of the Sanskrit works quoted by Sâyana were still unedited, whilst the references were brief, presupposing an intimate acquaintance with the works quoted. Max Müller had to trace these references, to copy the MSS. where they occur, and make full and careful indices. This he did, though often delayed by some obscure reference to Pânini's Grammar or Yâska's Glossary. All these references had to be found, and their meaning ascertained, before any printing could be begun. They are now given in his edition of the Veda. He tells us he was often driven to despair by some obscure reference which neither Burnouf nor Wilson, the greatest Sanskrit scholars of the day, could help him to discover. 'It often took me whole days—nay, weeks—before I saw light. In the purely mechanical part other scholars could, and did, help me; but whenever any real difficulty arose, I had to face it by myself, though after a time I gladly acknowledge that here too their advice was often valuable to me.'

Bunsen was determined, as his young friend would live in England, at all events for several years to come, that he should make the acquaintance of influential and distinguished people, not only in London society, but in scientific and literary circles, and therefore insisted on his attending, under his guidance, the meeting of the British Association, which in 1847 was held at Oxford. He not only attended, but prepared and read a paper in English on the relation of Bengali to the Aryan and aboriginal languages of India. He had been but a year in England, and though he had completely mastered English, and wrote and expressed himself correctly and forcibly, his pronunciation was still very foreign, and it was with no little trepidation that he stood up for the first time before a large and critical English audience. His subject was one entirely new to most of his hearers, but it excited great interest, and gave rise to a keen discussion, in which the young scholar was ably and chivalrously defended by Dr. Prichard, President of the Section, against the attacks and objections of certain members who thought that no good thing could come out of Germany. Though Max Müller never reprinted this paper separately, and considered it as the crude production of a very young man (he was not twenty-four), he received, as late as 1892, a letter from a gentleman engaged in like studies with this allusion to his early essay: 'It seems to me that you have stated far more clearly than I have seen elsewhere the main facts of Bengali agglutination, and it is astonishing to me how wonderfully you have grasped them without visiting Bengal.'

It was on this occasion that Max Müller first came into personal contact with Prince Albert, for whom he ever afterwards felt the strongest admiration and sympathy. They met from time to time at public dinners, or whenever the Prince Consort visited Oxford, but both were aware that, strongly as they felt drawn to each other by common interests and national sympathies, more constant intercourse would not be wise for either of them, both being, in their different spheres of work, jealously watched as foreigners by suspicious John Bull.

After Max Müller's return to London he tells his mother that he was 'feeling mentally and physically exhausted, as the various discussions in English tried him rather.' Still, he speaks of this meeting as a delightful time, and he felt sure it would be of use to him.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

July, 1847.

'The suggestion came, of course, again from Bunsen, who is determined to push me in the world. He continues just the same to me, and his friendship and affection make my life very happy here. Yesterday there was a great Egyptian dinner at Bunsen's. I was there; for, after long indecision, I too have joined the hieroglyphists. The printing goes on very slowly, as new letters have to be made, and it will be a whole year before the first volume is ready: but when everything is in order, I shall make £3 or £4 a week. As yet Bunsen is still my banker, but my credit stands high with him! The death of Fanny Hensel has grieved me very much. I have not heard Jenny Lind yet, it is too expensive. How gladly would I have a quiet fortnight with you; one gets no rest here.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

LONDON, July 13.

'London is really unbearable from heat and dust, and I am longing so for the country that I shall try and find a little room, if possible, at the seaside, which I know will do me good. If only England were not so very dear, especially when one wants to amuse oneself. Prince Waldemar is here, and I have seen him several times and had several good dinners with him. I enclose the menu of the largest dinner, given by the Directors of the East India Company. Each cover cost £5. It is impossible to describe it, and I assure you I had rather eat potatoes in Chemnitz! Lord John Russell was there, and the élite of society. Bunsen again did little else but introduce me to people who would be useful to me. But running about in society, eating, drinking, and talking, tires one out, and I shall get away as soon as I can.'

The printing of the Veda had now begun in real earnest, and on July 13, 1847, he was able to send to Burnouf in Paris the first two sheets of Volume I. 'How willingly,' he says, 'would I have visited Paris this summer to seek advice and information on many points from you, but I am chained here. When my first volume is ready I shall take a holiday, that I may present it to you in person. I rejoice in the prospect, for I cannot repeat often enough that I owe it to your advice and friendly sympathy alone that I am now realizing the plans I formed in my youth.'

In August he writes to his mother from 1, Garden Place, Lincoln's Inn :—

Translation.

'As you see I have changed my rooms once more, as there was a bad smell in the other house in this heat, and I thought it was not healthy. I am quite away from the street, and live as in a garden. I have in fact two houses, for all day long I am in the India House, where I have my own room, all surrounded by books and MSS. I have a long way to walk there and back every day, which is very good for me. My printing goes on well, so that I am quite happy and satisfied. I had to give up my stay in the country, or at the seaside, as I had neither money nor time for it. Instead, I have hired a piano, which is a great delight. How often I have thought of you lately, and your pleasant life at Dresden. Yes, however good the life here is for the brain and soul, one's heart often longs for something else, and if I had not Bunsen and his family, life here would often be very sad to me. But I will not complain, I am determined to be as happy as I can be, for how much brighter has my whole life turned out, than I ventured to expect or hope. My life in London now is so quiet and uniform that I have nothing to tell you. The Bunsens are going into the country, where he will rest after the long season. He does a great deal of literary work, and I read or hear it all, and we often have sharp discussions, as you may imagine, as I cannot help speaking out plainly, and he also wields a sharp sword. But he is delightful, and we always remain good friends.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

September 1.

'My rooms in London are delightful, and my piano a real joy. In the same house lives Dr. Trithen, an Orientalist, whom I knew in Paris, and who was once employed in the Office for Foreign Affairs in St. Petersburg. Then there are a great many other Orientalists in London, who are mostly living near me, and we form an Oriental colony from all parts of the world. Dr. Bergstedt, a Swede; Köllgren, a Finn; Abbé Bardelli, an Italian; Dr. Dillmann from Suabia; Dr. Spiegel from Bavaria; Dr. Weber from Berlin. When we are all together, it sounds like a perfect Babel, and we have a good deal of fun at our cosmopolitan tea-evenings.'

By the middle of October, Max Müller was able to send the first sheet of Sâyana's Commentary to M. Burnouf. He says in a letter dated '1, Garden Place, Oct. 18':—

Translation.

'This first sheet has cost me much time and trouble, as they had not sufficient types at Oxford, which caused endless delay. Now that they have founded the accented letters, I hope to get on faster, but I send this first sheet because if you have any serious objections to the general plan I have adopted, conformably with my position here in London, I could still make necessary alterations. I often feel that the Rig-veda and Commentary ought to have fallen into worthier hands, but I will do all that I possibly can. I count on your indulgence, but shall, at the same time, be most grateful if you will point out any mistakes.'

To this Burnouf replied :—

Translation.

November 9.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,—I thank you for having sent me the sheets of your grand edition of the Rig-veda. I use the word grand, not to avoid saying excellent, because I consider it both grand and excellent, but because I must express my admiration of Professor Wilson's fine and vigorous Devanâgarî type. I have examined your sheets, and I must own that I am astonished that in so short a time you have been able to master the mass of materials at hand. One has a right to demand of an editor a correct list, a suitable division of the words, an indication of the Hindu divisions according to the two systems, the text so far separated from the Commentary that they can never be mistaken the one for the other, a reproduction of the Pada MS. and position of the accents according to the copies of the Rishis. You have given all this with exemplary care and completeness. But you have given us much more, and here I cannot praise you too highly. You indicate the quotations, and trace them not only to works that are accessible, but to many that are still entirely unedited. I congratulate you with all my heart on your début, and I venture to say on your success, for your success is secured. You know me well enough, I hope, to feel the sincerity of my congratulations. We older men, who came too early to embark on the great enterprises which younger men can undertake, we have only the duty of clapping our hands to show the public what they ought to honour and esteem. Believe me, I shall not fail in doing this ; and it is a great delight to do it for a man whose knowledge I admire and whose character I love. And I think I may be allowed to reflect with pleasure on any effort I may have made to encourage you to march on in entire independence, avoiding all collaborations. This is the only thing on which I can pride myself, and it again is entirely to your honour, because it only proves that I recognized all that science might expect from you. Believe me that I am more than ever filled with this sentiment, and continue to reckon me among those who follow your success with the greatest delight.

'E. BURNOUF.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

November 9.

'My time is entirely occupied with the Veda . . . but my work is delightful, and I feel sure that in six or seven years it will bring in plenty, and I am quite independent, and that is worth more than anything else. But the idea of marrying is absurd, and happily as yet love has left me tolerably alone, for I have other things to fill my head and heart. I have just had an offer to go to Benares, and print the Veda there, which I have refused. I correspond with the Brâhmans there, and the Indian papers often mention Dr. M. M., but that is of no help.'

To Burnouf he writes :—

Translation.

I, GARDEN PLACE, December 5, 1847.

'Your last letter gave me the greatest pleasure, and I thank you warmly. I know well that you are full of indulgence and kindness, such as I must not expect from the severe critics of Russia and Germany, but I own that your favourable opinion, and that of Wilson, Lassen, and Bopp, are the most delightful reward, and the only one I wish for, and that it gives me new courage to persevere in a task that would otherwise often seem dry and distasteful. The news that I have received through M. d'Eckstein that you have successfully deciphered the Nineveh inscriptions would have astonished me, had one not been accustomed to such happy surprises from the successor of Champollion. I consider this discovery the grandest and most important of the century; it must throw light on many fundamental questions of ancient ethnography. Up to now, I have not found anything really solid and satisfactory in all the conjectures on the so-called Indian, Babylonian, and Assyrian inscriptions. I hear that Dr. Hincks sent yesterday to the Asiatic Society a complete translation of the inscriptions of Van, made by means of an Indo-germanic language. But I must examine it myself. Rawlinson has at last managed to copy a part of the third inscription at Behistun, and he writes that he now for the first time touches solid ground. Incredulous as I have been about all these promises and experiments, I am now convinced that under your guidance a new region will be opened to science, and I await the signal impatiently.'

This important year of Max's life was drawing to a close. His success had justified his perseverance in a career which had at one time seemed utterly hopeless, and he was rewarded at last for the long struggle, for the bitter self-denials of his early years.

For the first time we find a mention in his Christmas letter of a gift of money to the mother to whose unceasing care and self-forgetfulness he owed everything. This he never forgot to the last hour of her life, and it was his constant delight from this time onwards to add to her comforts and pleasures.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

I, GARDEN PLACE, LINCOLN'S INN,

December 11, 1847.

'... I must now give you some commissions. Take the enclosed £5 note and change it at a banker's, and with half of it buy something very nice for Frau Hofrätin Müller; with the other half something pretty for Frau Dr. Krug, and some toys for the two little Krugs.

'Your MAX.'

CHAPTER V

1848

Visit to Paris. Revolution. Settles at Oxford. Friends there. Letters to Burnouf and Bunsen.

THE year 1848 began gaily for the young stranger. He had moved to King William Street, Strand, to be a little nearer to the Prussian Legation, though he already began to recognize the disadvantage of being so far from his printers, now that the first volume of the Rig-veda was passing through the Press. No London firm could have undertaken the work, from want of the proper types, whilst the Oxford University Press, with the help of Professor Wilson, had secured the finest Devanâgarî types then known. Of his gaieties he writes to his mother:—

Translation.

5, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND,

January 27, 1848.

‘Last week I went to two balls in English families to whom I have been introduced. It was a beautiful sight, and the balls lasted till four. I have not treated myself to a new evening coat—my old one does fairly well, and I danced away in it. The young girls in England are very beautiful and very pleasant; one hardly sees a single ugly face in a ball-room—which one cannot say in either France or Germany—and so one spends a very pleasant evening. The Bunsens do not give balls, but most agreeable parties with good music. But my chief employment is my work at the East India House, and I hope this year to finish the first volume of about 600 pages.’

In February he found it necessary to visit Paris, to look at some MSS. in the Bibliothèque Royale, and was still there when the Revolution broke out. In the Autobiography he has described his difficulty in getting back to England, but says little of what he actually saw in Paris, and the letter he wrote to his mother immediately after his escape, for it was really that, is full of interesting details.

Translation.

LONDON, Monday, March 1, 1848.

‘I went for a fortnight to Paris, partly to see Hagedorn, partly to finish some work at the Bibliothèque Royale. You will have seen from the papers what a fearful time I had there, and I thanked God when I stood safe again on English ground. I am still so excited that I can hardly describe all I have seen and done. Since Tuesday last, I have had sleepless nights from fighting, the roar of cannon, burning of houses, fall of buildings, &c., men murdered by hundreds or simply shot down in the streets. No one’s life was safe, for there was neither Government, police, nor soldiers. The man in the blouse was lord of all, and blood ran in the streets, which were filled with barricades. Women on horseback, ruffians on the finest officers’ chargers paraded the streets, carrying Louis Philippe’s throne in triumph. The only brave soldiers were the Municipal Guards, and I saw them cut down and hacked in pieces by the mob. One could see all that went on from Hagedorn’s windows; the bullets whistled on every side, and yet ladies went out on foot pour voir la Révolution. We did the same, and were more than once pursued by the cavalry. I saw barricades built up of omnibuses, tables, and pianos, attacked and taken, and again built up, till at last the soldiers fraternized with the people, gave up their weapons, and finally withdrew. There was nothing grand in it. The French journals have no authority, for they are written by and for the victors, who proclaimed liberty of the Press, but against whom the Press dare not assert its liberty. It might have been worse, that is the only thing one can say for the mob. The Garde Nationale were cowards, never appeared at all the first day, from fear of the Minister. The second day everything seemed over and quiet, and one rejoiced that without any loss of life a blinded Ministry had fallen, and the people had carried their point in a constitutional way. But those who had made the demonstration the first two days were not yet satisfied; the Republicans and Communists tried to profit by the public excitement to stir the people up again. On the other side the friends of Thiers intrigued, especially Bugeaud, who was Commandant of Paris, and who on the evening of the second day could still have re-established order, had he not connived with his troops to place the Ministry in Thiers’ hands by letting the revolution have its own way a little. But when this was effected, it was too late; the people and the troops fraternized and streamed together to the Tuileries: the people armed, but not the military. Louis Philippe, the King of the barricades, fled from the barricades, and from the people who trusted their rights to him, and whose interests he had sacrificed in his selfish plans for his own dynasty. No resistance was then possible; the Republicans had no opposition to fear; the Duchess of Orleans with her sons was insulted, and the Republic proclaimed. The railways were already broken up, only the one to Havre had been forgotten, so over the barricades, and with shots on all sides, I got to the station at ten at night on Thursday. Next morning I reached Havre, and by six on Saturday evening, after a very bad passage, arrived in London. I am glad to have seen what I did, but seeing it was terrible. I was at one time quite close to the mob, and escaped by some side steps from the Boulevard des Capucins, where Guizot's house stands, into the Rue Basse des Remparts. In one instant came a shot, then a fusillade, and from that moment the fighting and flying never ceased, till Louis Philippe was gone and the Republic proclaimed. I could do little work, and am thankful to be back and in safety with my Veda. In spite of all this turmoil I am much better, and so my work will get on faster.'

It was Max Müller who brought Lord Palmerston the first certain news of Louis Philippe's flight.

To his friend Dr. Pauli, the Anglo-Saxon scholar, at this time settled in England, and whom he had first met in Paris, he wrote: 'It was terrible, but one learns history by it.'

On March 23 he writes again to his mother:—

Translation.

'You must not trouble yourself too much with these bad times, and their reforms and revolutions. They are developments which are unavoidable in history, and such crises are necessary to get rid of all the poison that has long been collecting in society. One must not imagine that a few men who are at the head of affairs make these revolutions. Such events are not made; they happen, through a higher Will, though the tools employed do not always seem the most worthy. When one sees the beginning of a revolution, with all its details and apparent accidents, as I saw it in Paris, one quickly perceives that it is in no one's power to reckon on these movements, where often one look, one resolution, one cry, determines the fate of hundreds and thousands. In such moments a man feels his true weakness, he realizes what he is; during the quiet course of a peaceful life a man becomes so self-confident and so certain of his own wisdom, that such shocks are necessary to bring him again to himself. These lessons are specially good for the wise diplomatists who imagine they can direct mankind according to their own prudent and self-seeking calculations, and for the sovereigns who imagine mankind is only made for them. Now is the time for all to learn that nothing lasts or gives us power but what is right, and the consciousness of having desired the welfare of others and not of our own selves. I hoped this movement would pass over more quietly in Germany than elsewhere. I trusted our kings as having a more upright judgement, and higher desires, more love for their people, and a more self-sacrificing spirit. Instead of this, everywhere, either cowardice or miserable blindness and self-confidence. The punishment for this will not be wanting, and it is sad that bad teeth can only be extracted with loss of blood and much suffering of the whole body. If all those gentlemen could be sent to England to the Universities, they might learn what are the conditions which alone make a king possible in these days. Would to God they might learn the lesson! The longer they hesitate, the greater will be the demands, the more terrible the conflict. The German people are good-tempered, but can be roused by deceit, distrust, and selfishness. Here in England all is quiet, and the means exist here for making revolutions in a peaceful, lawful, and constitutional way. I am only afraid they may summon Bunsen to Berlin. He might do much good there, but it would be a terrible loss to me, and I hardly think I could endure life here without him. He is the sort of diplomatist they all should be, a true man, simple and good, desiring and striving for what is right, and leaving the rest to Providence. For this the wise Metternich pronounces him to be no diplomatist. We shall see who stands firmest. In spite of the great excitement in which one lives, I can collect myself enough to work hard—and that quiets one. I am much better since I was in Paris, and have got rid of my cough. I really feel quite well, so there is no cause for you to be anxious. Your last letter arrived some time after I had sent mine off, for the post everywhere is most irregular now. If the weather is fine, I may spend part of the summer in Oxford to be nearer my printers. The Governors of the East India House wish to see something for their money; but I have only two arms—not a thousand like Vishnu.'

During his whole life in England, Max Müller found the variable climate, and especially the damp winters, a great trial to his strength, and in his two first winters passed in London he was so constantly laid up with severe colds and headaches, and unable to do his work, that his mother was seriously anxious about him. He always maintained that the severe cold of a German winter was less trying to the constitution than the fogs, and damp, and bitter east winds of England. Early in May he went for change to Oxford, intending only to stay through the bright summer months in a place which, from his first visit in June, 1847, cast the glamour of its beauty over him, and which was to be his home for above fifty-two years. He settled himself in two small rooms in Walton Place, as being near the Press, and soon after his arrival he writes to his valued patron and friend the first of many letters :—

Translation.

17, WALTON PLACE, OXFORD,

May 18, 1848.

‘YOUR EXCELLENCY,—Beautiful and pleasant as Oxford is at this season, and happy and contented as I feel in this sedes Musarum, it is difficult, at least on a day like this, the opening day of the Reichstag in Frankfort, to subdue the longing for one’s German home ; and so I hope you will allow me, at all events for a short time, to feel as if I were in my native surroundings, by writing to you. The delightful hours which you allowed me to spend with you in London are indeed the only thing that I miss here in Oxford, and that make me long sometimes to be back in old London. I therefore hope you will allow me from time to time to recall in writing those happy hours, and if my letters arrive like inopportune visitors in the midst of dispatches and diplomatic notes, please lay them aside, just as you so often used to say in your friendly way, “Now, make haste and go.” It is delightful that you have chosen Schleswig, and Schleswig has chosen you. It is indeed no usual object of ambition to sit on the same bench with master butchers and cobblers, but it is a sacrifice which in these days the true Aryan is willing to make for the Fatherland, when he has the right and opportunity to do so. In this indistinguishable chaos the necessary thing is to find men who can form a party, and attract a majority to them. In Germans, however, personal opinion and conviction are so supreme and unruly, that we need men who will seize the German John Bull, not, as is usual, by the horns, but in a friendly way, by his soft and weak points. No doubt there will be many good men of the State there, but few good statesmen. Everything in Frankfort will depend on how the first majority is formed, but I don’t believe that any party in Germany, be it what it may, would have any prospect of influence, if, when finding itself in a minority, it resorts to violence. Modern history accustoms itself to look on majorities which have arisen naturally in the same way as the old world must have originally looked upon their "Judgement of God," but with this difference, that for the Christian world the Godlike has assumed the form of humanity and freedom, by the side of that of nature and necessity. Life here in Oxford is remarkably pleasant; the place is so beautiful, and everybody so friendly and good, many people very superior and interesting. I have not seen much of Stanley, as he is very much occupied; but I know many of the Fellows, who pursue the same objects, and with even more understanding and determination. From many different sides one hears of a wish for reforms in the life of the University, but they are afraid of the Government; and that if they once give it the opportunity it will interfere far more than they desire. They particularly dread the tendencies of the Cheap Government, which might involve them in Cheap Education, and therefore they would rather remain quiet and keep their own. I have given your pamphlet on Schleswig to Stanley, Dr. Jacobson, Dr. Plumptre, and Dr. Acland, and I hear that Dr. Twiss means to write an answer; the same man who wrote on the Oregon question. One hopes it may come post factum, like King Oscar's troops, though I must own that it would be wonderful if they could persuade the Holger Danske to listen to reason and act accordingly.'

To his mother he describes his new life thus:—

Translation.

17, WALTON PLACE, May 21.

'Here I am at last settled in Oxford. I have already told you how beautiful it is, and now in spring it is perfect; the finest gardens I have ever seen, the old trees and the green velvety turf such as one only sees in England. I am enjoying the spring here as I have not enjoyed it for years, and feel better than I ever felt in hot, dirty, noisy London. I like the people here very much, and my work gets on much faster, which will delight you. Forty large sheets already printed, and £160 already spent! But I can live more cheaply here, and save a little, which as yet I have not been able to do. I have not had a piano for a long time; now I have hired one for 30s. a month. I find my music very useful in society, for they like to hear it, though few people play. Of course I miss Bunsen very much, but who can say how long he will stay in London? and in these busy times I have seen but little of him. My speech at Oxford is published under the title, "Three Linguistic Dissertations read at the Meeting of the British Association in Oxford, by Chevalier Bunsen, Dr. Meyer, and Dr. Max Müller." I find it a good visiting card here. It is difficult to say when my first volume will be ready, as the printing is sometimes easy and sometimes very difficult; but be sure I work as hard as I can, for it is most important for me to get the first part published.'

TO THE SAME.

*Translation.*OXFORD, June 28.

‘I live here so quietly that I often wish I had you all here, safe out of the trouble and turmoil in Germany. It is the greatest delight to walk in these gardens, where the old gables and towers peep through the green trees on all sides. I am asked to dinner nearly every day—this is at five o’clock in one of the old Colleges. After dinner we have coffee and tea in the gardens on the grass, and smoke our cigars. We have a great deal of music, and I get on very well with all these reverend sirs.’

Peaceful as his life in Oxford was, Max Müller was too patriotic not to be deeply occupied with the events in his native country, and he writes to Dr. Pauli:—

Translation.June 27, 1848.

‘One needs earnest and difficult work to keep one quiet. I suppose in time one will get accustomed to this new world, but up to now I have not had courage or power even to talk about it: in time the sea-sickness will leave one, and then one can watch the storm carefully and wonder at it. You ought to come to Oxford; it is the most beautiful city I have ever seen, and one must have seen it to know England. Living is tolerably cheap, and the libraries rich in manuscript treasures. I shall stay here till October, then publish a volume and go to Germany.’

Max Müller became almost immediately on intimate terms with a number of undergraduates, as well as many younger dons, whilst several of the heads of houses and Professors showed great kindness to the man whom they remembered as reading a paper but the year before at the British Association, on a subject quite unknown to most of them, but which had provoked interesting and important discussions. Dr. Gaisford was particularly condescending to the young scholar, who often mentioned with pleasure the real courtesy of the Dean, as being the only head of a house who thought it necessary to call before sending him an invitation to dinner.

He has given an amusing account of that visit, and the attack made on the Dean by his Scotch terrier, Belle. To the few who still remember those days the name of Belle will recall many a happy hour. She was a small terrier, by no means a great beauty, and had belonged to Robert Morier, who willingly passed her on to his friend, to avoid the trouble of looking after her. She lived to a great age, and gave her new master a good deal of occupation in taking care of her and her innumerable puppies. Her devotion made her very jealous, and when some years after a beautiful Skye puppy was given him by a much-loved friend, Belle ill-treated it so, that he had to part with it to save its life! Max Müller was always devoted to dogs, and his friends will recollect his great deerhound Oscar, Musk, a Skye terrier, and in later years his well-known dachshunds, Waldmann and Männerl, and at the very last, Longbow and Big Ben.

Among Max's intimate friends at this time were Morier, afterwards Sir Robert Morier, who died Ambassador at St. Petersburg; William Sellar, later on Professor of Latin at Edinburgh; Palgrave, to whose advice he owed a great deal when he first began to write English books; William Spottiswoode; Alexander Grant, who, after many years in India, became Principal of the University of Edinburgh; Theodore Walrond, afterwards his brother-in-law, and whom for many years he used to call his English conscience; Earle, later Professor of Anglo-Saxon; Church, afterwards Dean of St. Paul's; George Butler; ffolliott, who in the last letter he wrote to Max Müller says, 'Your friendship has been one of the happiest elements of my life'; Thomson, of Queen's, who became Archbishop of York; Story-Maskelyne, later Professor of Mineralogy; Clough, the poet; Dr. Stanley, then Tutor of University; Dr. Acland; Manuel Johnson, the Radcliffe Observer; Professor Donkin, drawn to him by their common love of music; 'Bodley' Coxé; Jowett, then the popular young Tutor of Balliol; and J. A. Froude, of Exeter. To the two last Max Müller was a staunch friend, standing by them when their opinions exposed them to a good deal of obloquy and closed many doors against them. Most of these men remained Max Müller's devoted and intimate friends through life; from others, from circumstances of residence and occupation, he was more or less separated, though when they met there was always a hearty recollection of the 'merry days when they were young,' and enjoyed many a joke and many a discussion in their various rooms, whether in College or in lodgings. The very few left who remember quite the early years when Max Müller first settled in Oxford, recall his great powers of attraction, his lively conversation, even though in still rather quaint English, his fun, his power of repartee, above all his kindly lovable nature, to which a singularly beautiful countenance bore witness, his brilliant pianoforte-playing, and behind all this a seriousness of purpose, a loftiness of aim, with an amount of general culture seldom met with in a man of little more than twenty-four; whilst the almost entire ignorance of the great subject to which he was devoting his life only added to their wonder and interest.

Mr. Tuckwell in his delightful Reminiscences says: 'I recall the black-haired, slight young foreigner in 1846<sup>1</sup> or thereabouts, known first as a pianist in Oxford drawing-rooms, whose inmates ceased their chatter at his brilliant touch.'

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

17, WALTON PLACE, June 13, 1848.

'Tis hard to carry a full cup even. Oxford is most beautiful, but one longs for German Professors, for Greek societies and seminars! My Veda gets on; forty-five sheets are printed. I have good news from India. The Pundits, to whom I sent proof-sheets, are delighted with the plan and the way it is being carried out. As it does not seem likely that the Prussian Government will at this moment grant any money for MSS. from India, I shall apply to the East India Company. The expense is very small, 1,000 lines of thirty-two syllables for eight shillings. I think of staying here till my first volume is ready, which it cannot be before the end of the year, and then I shall go to Germany. But I must find some further occupation here, for Sanskrit alone does not yield enough to live on. It is delightful to reconstruct a chapter in the historical consciousness of mankind, especially one that is so ancient and so important for the intellectual migrations of the Aryans as is the Vedic epoch. But when mankind is at work it requires people who can wield the hammer in order to forge a new link in the chain of humanity. Only I don't know with what hammer I should try to work, but it seems to me pretty certain that for the next thirty years the Veda and such literary ruins will find few friends and explorers. For what we now see is but the prelude to wake and shake the mind, to bring it into the necessary condition, "corruptos hominum mores bellis emendare atque conterere."

<sup>1</sup> 1848 it should be.

In the following letter to his mother he describes his first Commemoration, little imagining how many more he was to see, till his own children were enjoying them from thirty to forty years later :—

Translation.

July 11.

‘There were great festivities for the end of term. Guizot was here, two sons of Metternich, Baron von Hügel, and many of the best English families, and a crowd of such beautiful women as I have never before seen. The festivities lasted from early dawn till night; the gardens lighted up, with music and singing, were enchanting. There were good concerts, the Messiah, the Creation, in which Birch, Tadolinée, and Lablache sang; in fact it was magnificent, and champagne and hock flowed in streams. Now every place is empty. I have the beautiful gardens to myself, and that is delightful, where I take a walk of an evening and smoke my cigar; but it would be yet better on the Terrace at Dresden! “However——” as the English say, and I do my best to acquire an Englishman’s patience and indifference.’

The summer was spent quietly in Oxford, working at the Veda and the long Introduction, or Prolegomena, of which we hear more in the following year.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, August 8.

‘The times are not suited for quiet enjoyment, and who knows when this struggle of the discontented masses will cease? But when one remembers all the suffering and sorrow, the thousands who are perishing from war, disease, and famine, one ought to be contented oneself, and thank God if we escape with a few inconveniences. It sometimes seems to me wrong to be sitting and working here so peacefully in Oxford, whilst so many in Germany are torn away from their scientific employments and must share all the dangers of war. One is not better than all those who die by thousands in battle or of cholera, or who see all their prospects for life ruined in a moment. And yet, surely, all this want and calamity must do some good, by teaching men that they are placed on the earth not for enjoyment but for a struggle and trial: in quieter times one forgets too easily the real earnest task of life, and the true man in us perishes. Now every one must stand fast and be ready for anything. If we do our duty and have a good conscience and trust in God, this little world cannot do us much harm. I lead a most pleasant life here in Oxford. Many of my friends come to see me, and live in the same house—Dr. Köllgren from Helsingfors, Dr. Pauli from Berlin. Then of course I do not get through so much work—we take long walks, bathe, &c.; but when they are gone I shall be able to work hard again till the first volume is ready. That will not be till Easter, as the first volume will have 1,000 pages, and only 500 are now printed. Everything seems to have quieted down in Dessau: they had not a large aristocracy to put down! I should like to see for myself how things are, for here one can form but little idea about it.'

The next letter tells of the spread of the revolutionary spirit to Chemnitz, where his mother still lived, though no longer in her daughter's house.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, October 3.

'You can imagine my anxiety about you when I read in the papers of the insurrection of the workpeople in Chemnitz, of barricades and fighting in the streets, and remembered how far from strong Auguste is. From day to day I looked for a letter, and at last heard from you that you had escaped all danger. We must not complain of small deprivations, but thank God, who has watched over us hitherto with fatherly care. If I know that you are well in Chemnitz, and have always a sure refuge with Krug, and if you know that I am happy and well in Oxford, even if we do not see each other often, we can think of each other with perfect satisfaction; and how few can say that in these times. One cannot expect things to settle down in Germany for many years. I cannot wish to be back in Germany, however much I long for German life, for one would only be drawn into all these party conflicts, without power to effect any good. I often think it might be well to settle down entirely in England. I think one might be quite at home and happy here. If I go to Germany next year, I must look about and see what can be done there, and if any prospects open for me; if not, I must look out for some career that later on would settle me here. I like Oxford so much better than London, that I shall remain here. Life is cheaper here, and I had already saved £20, but have spent it on MSS. from India, which I need for my work. Dr. Pauli is still living here, which is very pleasant, and gives me some one to talk to. Dessau seems to set an example to the world with its liberal institutions. What does Stockmarr<sup>1</sup> say to it all? Uncle Fritz, doubtless, is much amused. I should like to see it with my own eyes; it sounds a little fabulous!'

Max Müller seems to have been so much absorbed in the <sup>1</sup> An old and very conservative General, married to the sister of Max Müller's aunt, Frau Präsident von Basedow. The old man lived to keep his Iron Wedding (sixty-five years), and died a few days after, as did his wife, and they were buried the same day.

Veda as to let a long time pass without any communication with his revered master, Burnouf, who sent him the following gentle reminder, which shows how even the life of a quiet student was upset by the political disorders of the times :—

Translation.

PARIS, October 7, 1848.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,—It is a long time since I heard anything of you, and enough has happened here to make me forget any one to whom I was less attached than I am to you. But I have heard of you indirectly. I received a few days ago a sign of your remembrance of me, which touched me much; and I have read your mémoire with delight, and have learnt from it many curious facts of the way in which Bengali has used for its own analytic purposes concrete words borrowed from Sanskrit. The work is well done, and I have observed with great satisfaction, among other things, a virtuous attack on the modernizers of Brâhmanism in the interests of Buddhism, which has nothing to gain by outraging history and good sense. I venture to assert that, notwithstanding their pretensions, the dilettante authors of these heteroclite hypotheses understand neither Brâhmanism nor Buddhism. I am now working at the second volume of my Introduction to Buddhism, having been obliged to set aside the work I had begun on the Nineveh inscriptions. These researches cannot be carried on usefully in a time of political disturbance, such as the present; the tempest in the streets distracts the mind. . . . Under these circumstances, I am devoting myself to Buddhism, to occupy my mind; it is the only one of my labours for which I do not need State aid. Yours heartily,

‘E. BURNOUF.’

To this Max Müller replied :—

9, PARK PLACE, November 1, 1848.

‘MY HONOURED MASTER AND FRIEND,—. . . I was very sorry to learn that the political agitation in France has disturbed your literary work. Every one felt that the only hope of a successful and scientific deciphering of the Nineveh inscriptions lay with you, for you stand alone in such work. Yet the second volume of Buddhism will be a welcome gift to many, to some perhaps not welcome, as it will destroy their last heteroclite hypotheses. Unfortunately things look very black for literature in Germany too, and I am glad that I can give my time here in England quietly to the Veda. The first Ashtaka, with a long introduction, will appear at Easter. I am now writing the latter, and I often wish I could go to you for advice, for here in England there is really no one who takes much interest in real Indian antiquity. Wilson has finished his History of British India, which is very much liked, and is at work now on a lexicon of modern Indian names for measures, weights, and other words in daily use between Indians and Englishmen. Besides that he is preparing a catalogue of the MSS. of the East India House, as well as a translation of the Rig-veda. It is wonderful how busy he is, though one often wishes he would devote his valuable time and powers more exclusively to Indian antiquity. . . . I have heard nothing of Baron d'Eckstein since the Revolution, and would gladly hear how he is. . . . My time is so taken up with printing the Rig-veda, which has reached page 608, that I have no time for any other work; for this I am very sorry, for the Commentary is terribly wearisome, and yet full of small difficulties, for which I often miss the help of MSS. from other parts of India. I have therefore ordered for myself a copy from Poonah, where your own valuable MS. was copied, and must await its arrival before I begin the second Ashtaka, as I have no collation of your MS. for that, and the MSS. here of the second Ashtaka are very imperfect. The East India Company has declared itself ready to buy Vedic MSS. if they can get them, so I hope for much new help from India.'

The following letter to Bunsen is the only allusion to a scheme which Max Müller can hardly have contemplated seriously, though a Pass Degree would have been child's play to him, and no doubt a life in College such as that led by many of his friends must have appeared more attractive than his solitary lodgings:—

Translation.

17, WALTON PLACE, October 8, 1848.

'I think of going to London for a few days early next week to do some work at the East India House. It would be a great delight to me if I could see you for a few minutes, to ask your advice in a matter which occupies me a good deal. The revolutions in Germany have laid such hold on all the circumstances of life, and have so undermined the foundations of society, that one loses all courage to build one's future on such a soil. Unless one feels the strength and power to take an active part in initiating and settling matters, but wishes to find one's ideal of life in the narrow quiet circle of science, one has the right, I think, to seek shelter there, where science, if not patronized and aided, is at least tolerated and let alone. With all my love of the past, and with a full belief in the future of Germany, I feel more drawn at present to English than to German soil. My work will keep me in England for the next few years; and as Oxford is a very pleasant place of residence, I have an idea of entering one of the Colleges as an undergraduate, keeping my twelve terms, and then taking my degree. I should hope to defray the expense by my own work, and the competition in the Oriental market is so small, that my prospects later on would probably not be bad. It is, of course, difficult to resolve to take such a backward step, and begin again from the beginning, when my friends and contemporaries have already found their spheres of activity as teachers and Professors. My own studies would meet with many interruptions, but when one sees that the path one has hewn for oneself does not lead to the goal, it is better to turn round than to pursue the wrong road till no return is possible. My work goes on merrily; seventy-two sheets are printed, and I am writing the preface, which often overwhelms me; but I have time till Easter, when the first two volumes and the preface will appear. Dr. Pauli is still living with me, but he has a good chance of being appointed to the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh. In the hope of soon having the happiness of seeing you, I am, with my whole heart, yours obediently.'

We hear no more of the undergraduate scheme, and on his return from London he moved to pleasanter lodgings, No. 9, Park Place, now 18, Banbury Road, where he remained till January, 1856. Here he occupied the front floor, and some other German generally lodged in the same house.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, November 5.

'I have been staying with Bunsen in London and the country for a week. I was in his house, and we had long talks together, and I came back to my work with fresh courage. He is a delightful, excellent man, so that it is a real refreshment to see him. He is so quiet, so contented, and so confident, although living in the very midst of all the troubles; he trusts mainly to Frankfort, and his whole soul is with Germany. When I returned to Oxford I changed my lodgings. If I could afford it I should take riding lessons. Every morning crowds of students pass by in their red coats and jockey caps going out hunting; but that is very dear, so I never think of it, but work on quietly at the Veda, and when Volume I is finished, I shall pack up and be off; 620 pages are finished. It has been a hard piece of work. I have no desire to join the Dessau militia. I would rather become a naturalized Englishman. The news from Vienna is terrible, one can hardly believe it, and in Berlin it is fermenting and seething as if for something of the same sort.'

On his birthday he writes to her again:—

Translation.

OXFORD, December 6, 1848.

'Twenty-five years, an age that might make one sad, but we are all well and happy; though my life in a foreign country often seems too long, and I should like to get away; but it can't be helped, one must work to live, and work where one finds work. I am quite content with mine. Of course, if one could find work in Germany instead of here, and live at one of the Universities on the Rhine, at Bonn or Heidelberg, one might enjoy life more. That will come some day, and then we can live happily together and drink a good glass of Rhine wine. Hurrah! If only the Veda were not so long! The old Indians 3,000 years ago might have written less; 1,000 quarto pages. But work agrees with me, and I take long walks, and the life is, on the whole, very pleasant, and yet one feels as if one hardly belonged to it; people are too polite for one to feel quite at one's ease. Do you know I would willingly take the post of Librarian at Dessau if it were free? I could carry on my work there, and in these troublous times, the more retired one's life, the safer and happier for one. But those are only plans, and one must be satisfied to be independent and able to earn one's daily bread; and it is better in these days to be a bachelor, in spite of all the good advice you give me from time to time—rich heiresses are not so plentiful, even in England. Last week Jenny Lind sang here in a concert. I had never heard her, and paid my ten shillings, which I do not regret. She sings wonderfully, has a full, strong, rich voice, but there was a want of softness. She sang Italian songs, and Weber's Und ob die Wolke, which she sang most beautifully, and showed a real love of her art. Her Swedish songs are lovely, so original. I longed to hear her sing some of Mendelssohn's songs; but she had to think of her public, and the John Bulls have little knowledge of music. She said afterwards to a friend of mine, that she considered Mendelssohn's Suleika the most beautiful song she knew, and she loved to sing it. The people here were wild about her, perfectly enchanted; but when Beethoven's Septette was played as a finale, they mostly went away; perfect barbarians! And yet they are good honest people, with whom it is easy to live when one understands them. I get on very well with John Bull, and he does not mind when I sometimes take him by the horns and shake him.'

To Bunsen he writes the same day:—

Translation.

December 6, 1848.

'You will have perhaps already seen in the paper the delightful news of Trithen's appointment as Professor here. I am as pleased as if I had got it myself, for it was perhaps the only way of making a good useful man of him, after all the disappointments which of late weighed more and more on him. Though I had myself thought of this place, and had perhaps better chances than Trithen, I feel I have acted rightly, perhaps calculated rightly; for had Trithen divided votes with me, most probably a third candidate would have appeared, whereas now Trithen was almost unanimously elected. I hope something of the same sort may be found for Pauli, for I have begged Trithen to do all he can to get the Secretaryship of the Geographical Society for him, which Trithen must give up. So one helps another, and if one only desires what is right, one feels happy and at home in that united and ever-mysterious concatenation of results and circumstances which constitute human life. Twenty-five years of this life lie behind me to-day, and one feels involuntarily in a more earnest and solemn frame of mind at such a moment. I look back with gratitude on the first half of my life, which, notwithstanding many sad moments, leaves me with the memory of a happy youth, and which at the same time, after many struggles, has given me a firm faith in a Divine Providence, trust in mankind and peace in myself, and cheerful courage to begin the second half of my life. If it is hard to give up all the plans and hopes which might have been realized in better times, still life is worth living, be it but a life of duty. God will help me further. Only continue your sympathy and kindness to me. It will be my endeavour to show myself worthy of them.'

To this Bunsen sent the following beautiful answer, which is the first of the letters printed by permission of Baroness Bunsen in Chips, Vol. III, first edition. Being out of print it is given here:—

Translation.

LONDON, December 7, 1848.

'MY DEAR M.,—I have this moment received your affectionate note of yesterday, and feel as if I must respond to it directly, as one would respond to a friend's shake of the hand. . . . And now, my very dear M., I congratulate you on the courageous frame of mind which this event causes you to evince<sup>1</sup>. It is exactly that which, as a friend, I wish for you for the whole of life, and which I perceived and loved in you from the very first moment. It delights me especially at this time, when your contemporaries are even more dark and confused than mine are sluggish and old-fashioned. The reality of life, as we enter the period of full manhood, destroys the first dream of youth; but with moral earnestness, and genuine faith in eternal Providence, and in the sacredness of human destiny in that government of the world which exists for all human souls that honestly seek after good—with these feelings the dream of youth is more than realized. You have undertaken a great work, and have been rescued from the whirlpool and landed on this peaceful island that you might carry it on undisturbed, which you could not have done in the Fatherland. This is the first consideration, but not less highly do I rate the circumstances which have kept you here, and have given you an opportunity of seeing English life in its real strength, with the consistency and stability, and with all the energy and simplicity that are its distinguishing features. I have known what it is to receive this complement of German life in the years of my training and apprenticeship. When rightly estimated this knowledge and love of the English element only strengthens the love of the German Fatherland, the home of genius and poetry. I will only add that I am longing to see you amongst us; you must come to us before long. Meanwhile think of me with as much affection as I shall always think of you.'

<sup>1</sup> Trithen's election to Taylorian Professorship.

Max Müller spent Christmas with his kind friends at Totteridge, but the large and merry family party did not quite make up for the distance from his own relations, and when sending his mother a little money, which he exhorts her to spend and not hoard up, he adds, 'The day will come that we shall again be all together—only patience—in time all will come right.'

CHAPTER VI

1849

Death of sister's children. Froude. Visit to Lakes. Prix Volney.
Publication of first volume of Rig-veda. Carus. Visit to Germany.

MAX MÜLLER returned from his Christmas at Totteridge and three days alone in London with Bunsen with renewed health and courage for his work, resolved that, whatever effort it cost him, this year should see the publication of the first volume of the Rig-veda. Not only the East India Company, but Sanskrit scholars abroad were getting impatient for a first instalment of his great work; all but Burnouf forgetting the labour and time involved in contending single-handed with such a task. His old master, Brockhaus, wrote to him from Leipzig, urging him to publish some part at once: 'You must have printed a good deal; why leave us so long in suspense? Pending your edition, all Vedic studies remain vague and unsettled.' But unmoved by such complaints Max Müller pursued his own course, determined that his work should not be injured by hurry or carelessness. He tells his mother that he hardly gives himself the time to write her his usual monthly letter, 'I do nothing but work at the Veda.'

On his return Max found his old Paris friend, Dr. Pauli, who later on became Bunsen's private secretary, settled in Oxford, in the same house in which he himself lodged; so that although it was vacation, and Oxford was nearly empty, he had pleasant companionship. A very intimate friendship sprung up between the two, and their letters show on what easy terms they were with each other; and though their different lines of study drew them apart, they had the deepest affection for each other to the last. Dr. Pauli died in 1882.

At this time, Max Müller made an attempt to take up his Diary again, in which he had written nothing for four years. This attempt lasted about a week, and the habit was never resumed, except for a short time in 1857.

DIARY, 1849.

Translation.

January 6.

‘What a pause! By mere chance I found this book to-day, and as I read it can hardly believe I wrote it! Four years are gone, perhaps the most important of my life; well I remember them, though I have not written them down. But such short notices are interesting in later years, and so I will begin again. I conquered Hagedorn, have learnt of Goldstücker and Trithen, and stand well with Bunsen; 688 pages of the Veda are printed, and my way tolerably clear. To-day I received the news of G. Hermann’s death; Letronne, too, died lately; where are their successors? I would gladly have seen old Hermann again; he was so brave, and noble, and free—a real Greek, and yet a German, with his small bright eyes. He has not lived in vain! Now for politics, but where to begin? In Germany all is tottering, and only kept up by bayonets. The King is frightened at the Imperial Crown. If Bunsen only stays quietly in England! He is to-day with the Queen; one hopes it is not to take leave. Stockmar, too, is there; I have seen his picture, quiet and clever; he influences Bunsen, who, however, makes use of him. Now vacation in Oxford. I worked bravely since I spent Christmas with Bunsen. This evening at a horrible party with —— in —— College. Ugly men and women, bad music; escaped with Pauli and Sellar, and smoked cigars in Balliol with Weatherly.’

January 7.

‘A real English Sunday, which produces a certain dullness even in one’s work. Read proof-sheets, and studied Lepsius’s (Egyptian) Chronology without much effect. There are no clear results there as yet, though many clever hypotheses and difficulties. There is so little in Egypt to warm one! Walked with Sellar, dined with Weatherly, who had an evening party; on the whole pleasant, but not remarkable, so that men took to horse-play; that seldom happens in Germany. Bunsen has gone to Berlin, ostensibly to be instructed on the German question, but one hopes that his letters, which he let me read in Totteridge, have had an effect, and his presence may do more—unfortunately only for the moment—in the highest circles: may he come back safely! Pity that he is a diplomatist, or that the world wants such clever men.’

To Bunsen he writes on January 24 :—

Translation.

‘If you are really going to exchange beautiful Totteridge for the dusty Wilhelmstrasse, I am sure England will soon become strange to me. You may laugh, but pray believe that the thought of you is so closely united with my whole thoughts and wishes, however seldom I venture to intrude upon you, that I cannot accustom myself to the idea of living so entirely separated from you.’

On January 29 we find Max Müller writing to Burnouf to inquire about the Prix Volney, a prize founded by Volney for the best work on language, written in any language during the year, and sent in for competition. He asks if his paper on the relation of Bengali to the other Indian languages, read before the British Association, was of sufficient importance to have any chance of winning the prize. Burnouf had noticed the little article very favourably in the Journal Asiatique. Max Müller ends his letter thus :—

‘The printing of the Rig-veda goes on very slowly, and yet I give up nearly all the day to it, and often the night also. Ninety sheets are printed, up to half of the sixth Adhyâya, but I have undertaken a little too much, and I find I have not much time to study for myself, and arrange in some sort the results of my researches. I shall have to be content with presenting only the materials to the learned world, and all I wish is that they may find the text of my edition correct according to the MSS., and that others who are more worthy, and more skilful than I am for discoveries in the highest philology, may draw the inferences. In any case the mines of the Rig-veda are not the mines of California; the grains of gold are not to be found so near the surface that the pipîlakâs<sup>1</sup> can find them without any effort. It is for me to act as miner and for others to sift the ore; for it is given to few persons to do both, as you have done for the Zend-Avesta.’

But occupied as he was with his work, his longing for home and German life is constantly shown in his letters to his mother; and in one of them, in utter weariness of spirit, he writes of Oxford as ‘the most tedious place in the whole of tedious England.’ One pleasant prospect he had this summer; he had found occupation for his old friend Victor Carus as assistant to Dr. Acland, and the letters to his mother are full of happy anticipations of his arrival.

<sup>1</sup> Gold-finding ants in the Mahâbhârata.

On February 9 Burnouf answered Max Müller's inquiries about the Volney Prize. On consideration his honoured master evidently thought the treatise too short for the Volney competition, and that being printed with Bunsen's and Meyer's much longer papers might also be a disadvantage. 'Men are so made,' says Burnouf, 'that size and bulk impose even on the most enlightened people. You have plenty of time to decide, and I hope you are convinced that if you compete your work will find a zealous advocate in me. I am so occupied with all the troubles in which we live, that I have become sadly and uselessly idle, and my health suffers. I owe the Revolution a disease of the heart. Receive the assurance of my lasting friendship.'

This year began Max Müller's great intimacy with J. A. Froude, which continued till the death of the latter in the autumn of 1894. On the publication of the Nemesis of Faith early in this year, and the consequent loss of his Fellowship, Max Müller was one of the few people in Oxford who stood by Mr. Froude and took a deep and active interest in his future plans of life. A remarkable letter from Bunsen on the subject will be found in the third volume of Chips (first edition). The following letter is in response to this:—

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, May 9, 1849.

'Froude has asked me to tell you that he will be in London in the course of a few days, and that his great wish is to see and talk with you. It would be very sad if talents such as Froude's fell into the hands of English Radicals, Chartists, and Unitarians, who are already opening their arms for him. You will see that Froude, on the contrary, has all the best elements of the High Church party in him, that the unity of the Christian Church is his ideal, for which he would sacrifice as much as a German for the unity of Germany. I am quite convinced that the regeneration of the English Church can only come from the High Church party. It alone has influence, and the respect of the English people, and possesses the best intellectual power. Newmanism is now taking a direction of which formerly one had no idea, and which with all its bad motives must produce, nolens volens, the finest effect. In order to prove the necessity of belief in authority, men forget, to a certain degree, the danger of the use of the sacred writings, their contradictions and difficulties with regard to chronology, astronomy, and geology. "Give me the Bible," said Socinius, "and I will prove all my heresies." Ewald's name is constantly mentioned here; he has proved as a grammarian that the five books of Moses were not written by Moses, thus destroying the theory of inspiration, and faith demands new guarantees. This the old Fathers foresaw, and therefore kept the Bible from the people. . . . Whence then come all the difficult passages in the Bible? Because with your idiotic theological grammarians, you cannot enter into the language of the Bible. Where is there anything in the Bible of your inspiration à la Houdin<sup>1</sup>? It is not the language, but the spirit of the Bible which has become strange to us. . . . Newmanism was originally natural and honest in the English Church. The soil and air spoils it and inclines it to Romanism, but even this spoiling must work for good, and bring the English Church into a state of fermentation out of which she will come purified and reformed. Mere transference and translating of German works would never have any influence in England, but if men like Froude, who know the English nation, could show the practical results of German investigations and give them to the people not as a foreign, but as a native product, it might be possible for England to complete its reformation. There are people who believe as little in English mental power as in German marine power, but I have seen so many excellent gunboats launched here, and think that one might risk an Eckenförde<sup>2</sup>. Froude is already more of a little steamship, that need not fear the salt water, but he wants more ballast, and that he must fetch from Germany, or he will suffer shipwreck. Visé his passport for a German port, where, spite of all storms, there is less danger than on the Dead Sea.'

Whilst working hard and almost entirely absorbed in the Veda, his thoughts were unexpectedly turned into another channel by the almost sudden death of two of his sister's children within three weeks of each other. The devoted young mother never really recovered from this sorrow.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, April 4, 1849.

'The news of the death of my little godson was wholly unexpected, and filled me with sorrow, especially for poor Auguste, who, doubtless, feels this first loss deeply; but if the poor little fellow was so weakly, it is a blessing that God called him back so quickly to Himself.

<sup>1</sup> A great conjurer.

<sup>2</sup> An engagement in the Danish-Prussian War, 1849.

I know that it is useless to look for comfort in such thoughts, or that they lessen the grief and pain. Nor should they, for sorrow is necessary and good for men; one learns to understand that each joy must be indemnified by suffering, that each new tie which knits our hearts to this life must be loosed again, and the tighter and the closer it was knit, the keener the pain of loosening it. Should we then attach our hearts to nothing, and pass quietly and unsympathetically through this world, as if we had nothing to do with it? We neither could nor ought to act so. Nature itself knits the first tie between parents and children, and new ties through our whole life. We are not here for reward, for the enjoyment of undisturbed peace, or from mere accident, but for trial, for improvement, perhaps for punishment; for the only union which can ensure the happiness of men, the union between our self and God's self, is broken, or at least obscured, by our birth, and the highest object of our life is to find this bond again, to remain ever conscious of it, and hold fast to it in life and in death. This rediscovery of the eternal union between God and man constitutes true religion among all people: religion means binding together again. The impression made on me by the look of a child who is not yet conscious of himself and of the world round him, is that of still undisturbed godliness. Only when self-consciousness wakes little by little, through pleasure or pain, when the spirit accustoms itself to its bodily covering, when man begins to say I, and the world to call things his, then the full separation of the human self from the Divine begins, and it is only after long struggles that the light of true self-consciousness sooner or later breaks through the clouds of earthly semblances, and makes us again like the little children "of whom is the kingdom of heaven." In God we live and move and have our being—that is the sum of all human wisdom, and he who does not find it here will find it in another life. All else that we learn on earth, be it the history of nature or of mankind, is for this end alone, to show us everywhere the presence of a Divine Providence and to lead us through the knowledge of the history of the human spirit to the knowledge of ourselves, and through the knowledge of the laws of nature to the understanding of that human nature to which we are subjected in life. The death of a child is as if the flash of the Divine eye had turned quickly away from the mirror of this world, before the human consciousness woke up and thought it recognized itself in the mirror, often only to perceive for a moment, just as it closes its eyes for the last time, that that which it took for itself was the shadow or reflection of its eternal self. All this is not written in the Bible, but enough to guide the thoughtful Christian. It cannot be given to men, but each must find it for himself, and many paths lead to the same goal. If you think differently, there is no harm, for the difference lies only in the form, in names and words; on the whole we agree, and if a difference of life and occupation, if especially the powerful impressions of the moment bring greater joy or greater sorrow, and often lead to excitement, to doubts, one recovers oneself and finds that the doubts and difficulties lie where we ourselves have made and seek them! Each one must help himself, for it is difficult to discuss such things! A good conscience is better than all knowledge; that alone gives the peace we so sorely need. It is not enough to believe and pray, we must work and try to make ourselves useful. With a firm, upright will one can conquer everything. A good sailor is as self-possessed in a storm as in fine weather, for he knows no wave can rise higher than God wills. Those are the best statesmen in the present crisis who do their duty according to their conscience, unheeding party strife and noise. There is no rule of statesman's craft like "Do right and fear no one." Instead of this the wise diplomatists believe that they can do better with their tricks and stratagems, on which they place more reliance than on the eternal law of universal history, that what is good bears good, what is evil, evil fruit. And what applies to statesmen applies to every individual, and this everlasting vacillation and hesitation in Germany and elsewhere are more the result of infidelity, selfishness, and vanity than of anything else, and must naturally meet with their reward. I consider myself most fortunate in not being drawn into this whirlpool, and as little as I should hide my convictions, if so circumstanced that they might produce some good, so little would I exchange my study for a club (political) and my Veda for newspaper-writing, from ambition, passion, or sloth. These are the three powerful levers of our modern statecraft. Buy something for me for Auguste's birthday and give me credit till I come, which will be some time yet. But I won't grumble; I know this first volume of the Veda is of the greatest importance for me, and that I must do everything in my power to make it as good and perfect as possible. I will not tell you how much I long for home, but I should not enjoy it, if I had neglected anything in my work, for when I come I mean to enjoy myself; but spring, summer, and autumn may pass first, though I work as hard as I can without hurting my health. Bunsen has invited me several times to stay with them, but gladly as I would do so, I have always refused, so as not to waste time. I expect Victor Carus in August, so that I can myself introduce and settle him here. I shall be glad to have him, and he seems very much pleased with the post, though he only gets £100 a year.'

The following letter is interesting, as containing a mention of Tennyson, whose poems Max had learnt to admire from Palgrave, who gave him the earlier volumes :—

9, PARK PLACE, April 27.

‘MY DEAR PALGRAVE,—When I went to London a fortnight ago, I hoped to see you there, but all my plans were upset, and instead of staying in town three days (this was all the furlough I could get from myself), I was there only for about six hours, and spent the rest of my time near London. London is certainly not the place to see one’s friends, but Oxford is, and I hope you will keep your promise as soon as your duties as Ministre de l’Instruction Publique will allow you. Although I can offer you no lotus, you will find a good weed, which, you may tell Tennyson, does just as well. I can quite imagine how you must rejoice in his acquaintance, and I am afraid you will soon look down from the poetical height of the Tennysonian Olympus pitying that unhappy set of mortals who through their philosophical spectacles see only forms and shadows, while you, a poet amongst poets, enjoy life and light. However, you read old Goethe—he is more than a poet, and more than a philosopher, he is a full man, a whole humanity in himself. I wish I could read him with you for my own sake, not for yours, for you are not the man to misunderstand him. Did it not strike you in Froude’s Nemesis how the death of the child is a beautiful echo from the Wahlverwandtschaften? Oxford is flourishing again. Stanley, Jowett, &c., are up. Old Froude, however, has left a blank, and if you saw how they have pulled down your house, and how the fireplace where we smoked so many a jolly cigar is exposed to the eyes of the vulgus profanum, you would find it a subject not unworthy an elegy. Plans for the summer I have made none, but think that my work will keep me till September. Then I shall go to pay homage to the German Emperor, or to the President of the German Republic, an alternative which will be decided in a very few days. Bye, bye, old fellow. Don’t forget Oxford and the old set, who send you their love.’

To Dr. Pauli, who had settled in London, he writes :—

Translation.

OXFORD, May 14.

‘My printer rides me nearly to death. I must soon unseat the fellow and go to grass. You would do better if, instead of working till you are weary and worn, you were to come here to us, where you would amuse yourself thoroughly.’

After all the sorrow that his sister had passed through, her mother had taken her for a few days’ change to Dresden.

They had hardly arrived before the Revolution of 1849 broke out. Max Müller saw in the papers the serious aspect of affairs, and for days had no letter from his mother. He writes to her:—

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, May 22.

‘I can hardly tell you the anxiety with which I awaited your last letter. I never had a line for more than a month, and was afraid that you were ill from all the sorrow; and then came the terrible days in Dresden, and I read each day in the papers of the fighting and destruction spreading more and more towards the part of the town where I knew you were. Thank God that you escaped! but when you write that cannon-balls flew right over you, you cannot wonder that I am terrified. If this goes on in Germany I cannot leave you there without protection, and I am really thinking of giving up my work here, and going to you. In times like this all other considerations must give way, and many plans be given up. Why should one live on here in peace and quiet whilst others have to make such sacrifices? If I could only have you here with me! I have been thinking it over day and night, not the cost only, but if you could bear it here, so entirely alone, I all day at the Library or busy at home, and you with no one you could understand. I do not urge you to come, I only suggest it, and if you come I will gladly give up my plans for travelling when Vol. I is out. Your account of little Agnes’ death<sup>1</sup> was heartrending. I cannot tell you how hard it is to hear all this from far away, and then not to have a moment’s rest from the incessant pressure of work and care and sorrow. Wherever one looks all is black and hopeless: I am so out of spirits that for weeks I have been nowhere, and find no peace unless I forget myself in work. If I could do anything to give you a pleasure, that is the only happiness I wish for.’

Some time before this he had written to Dr. Pauli:—

Translation.

PARK PLACE, 1849.

‘MY DEAR PAULI,—I expect every day to receive marching orders, or else be denounced as a deserter and unworthy son of my Dessau Fatherland! The young Dessauers have marched; the old Dessauers, such as the old Fritzes, are, alas! no longer to be found in our days. It seems hardly possible to avoid a civil war; folly has grown to madness, and one shudders in thinking of the consequences. Well, for the present, I shall stay quiet with my Veda, notwithstanding all Dessau Prime Ministers. One lives from day to day, till the real marching order comes. If you see the Minister Pulski, tell him that in the old Tory University of Oxford, at the last debate at the Union, a vote of sympathy with Hungary was carried by a large majority.'

<sup>1</sup> She died three weeks after her baby brother, aged four years.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, June 15.

'As I opened your last letter the little lock of Agnes's hair fell out; dear little child, how much you have lost in her, especially as she seemed so devoted to you, and was already so useful to you. I own that my hopes for a speedy solution of the difficulties in Germany disappear more and more, and though I still trust my later life will be spent there, I shall now begin to look about for a settled position in England. I am convinced that after a time it would not be difficult to find a settled and remunerative occupation, where I could give you a pleasanter life than in this student's housekeeping. The great advantage of my present post is, that for the next six or eight years, I can live decently and am not forced to accept the first appointment that turns up. God will help further, and, notwithstanding the loneliness and the strange climate in which I have now lived so long, I recognize with deep thankfulness how much better off I am than many of my friends, though I have not deserved it. I lately received such a kind invitation from Bunsen for a party, that I went to London, and stayed with him two days. He lives in another house, a very fine one, one of the best in London. They had asked 750 people—the whole Corps Diplomatique, and the élite of English society. The whole house was like a garden, the balconies covered with awnings from which one had a splendid view over London, the garden of the house illuminated, beautiful music, German songs with a full chorus, from the German Opera now in London. I cannot describe the diamonds and the dresses, but I have never seen such a crowd of beautiful women and girls together. Guizot was there, and Palmerston; in fact, all the lions and lionesses of the season. The next evening I was invited to Lord Ellesmere's, one of the richest men here, whose collection of pictures is famous. Only think of looking round in the middle of a conversation and seeing on all sides Raphaels, Titians, Murillos, Carlo Dolces—all originals! This sort of thing only exists in England. Bunsen is unchanged in his affection; in spite of all he has to do, I always get a few lines from him as soon as anything of interest happens. He always hopes for the best, though prepared for the worst.'

After telling his mother she is wrong in entirely shutting herself up, he ends with these words:—

'Every one carries a grave of lost hope in his soul, but he covers it over with cold marble, or with green boughs. On sad days one likes to go alone to this God's acre of the soul, and weep there, but only in order to return full of comfort and hope to those who are left to us.'

Knowing the general ignorance in England at that time as to the value and meaning of the Rig-veda, Max Müller had been busy in writing a full and explanatory preface to the first volume. This, when finished, he gave to Wilson, who corrected and praised it, and had nothing to object to, but when Max Müller on June 1 showed him a letter he had written on the subject to the Directors, he suddenly turned round and seemed determined it should not be printed, and also told Max that he, Wilson, would never hear of his returning to live in Germany till the whole of the Rig-veda was finished. Though Max Müller had kept to his bargain and prepared his fifty sheets a year, Wilson, whose translation depended on his edition, scolded him like a schoolboy, telling him he might do more if he chose. The next day Wilson seemed to repent of his ill humour, and said he would like to see the preface printed as a separate work, not with the Veda. Max Müller concludes his account of the whole scene with these words, 'I cannot make that old man out. He is honest and straightforward, of great power and energy, but nothing to grease the wheels.'

In his letter to the Court of Directors Max Müller mentions that in this preface, which consisted of 300 pages quarto, he had given for the first time an account of the Vedic literature and its three distinguishable periods, and had explained the relation of the Vedic to the rest of Sanskrit literature. He had evidently discussed the matter with Bunsen, for in a letter written about the middle of June he says, 'I have at once copied again the letter which you were so good as to correct, and for which you have personally secured a good reception, and enclose it, begging you, if all is right, to post it,' and in September he writes to Bunsen:—

Translation.

PARK PLACE, 1849.

'The news of the success of my petition was a complete surprise—therefore all the more joyful, and all the more so that I again owe the success to your friendly services. Your proposal, which the Directors accept, gives me far more than I asked. Of course I shall print and publish it in England, but first I shall go to Germany, and spend the winter there. Are three months of holiday really too much after three years' work and absence from home?'

After the pleasant visit to Bunsen in June, he writes to him:—

Translation.

'I have returned safely to my Isola Bella, as though after a fairy voyage. The awaking after such a beautiful dream is not always pleasant, and so I will employ the first moments of my solitude here, whilst my Sanskrit does not yet attract me, in thanking you for the refreshing hours which your kind invitation secured me. . . . "Nil desperandum Teucro duce et auspice Teucro!" But what would have become of me had not such a Teucer taken me up? Now I do not despair of finding a new Salamis, wherever it may be! If the wind improves, then up with the sail; if it is against one, then "pull away," and perhaps at last one will reach a safer and German port. Oxford is so beautiful just now, I wish I could show it to you. . . .'

It was not long before his unremitting work began to tell on him. He says in a letter at this time, 'I am writing all day,' and worse almost than this was the constant worry of trying to hurry on the printers. At length he acknowledges that 'the English will not be driven, one must take them as they are.' His headaches became almost incessant, and his doctor at last insisted on his taking some rest, so Morier carried him off to the Lakes to join a reading party under Jowett, Froude being also in the neighbourhood. He writes from there to Burnouf:—

July 26, 1849.

'The reason I have left your last friendly letter so long unanswered is that I wished to send you an essay for the Prix Volney. I have followed your kind advice, and instead of sending in the printed essay, I have put together a special one for this purpose from my Collectaneum. It treats of the history of the civilization of the Aryan nations before the fifteenth century B. C., as far as one can construct it from the researches of comparative philology. I was very much grieved to hear that your health has suffered of late, and that your work has been therefore interrupted. I hope you are now feeling better, and are able to carry on your important investigations with renewed vigour. I have been ill again and had to leave Oxford to recruit here at the Westmoreland Lakes. I hope soon to be so far better as to be able to finish the first Ashtaka. Rawlinson will soon come to England, and has promised the explanation of the Babylonian inscriptions. Wilson is busy with an English translation of the Rig-veda; he does not consider the translation of Langlois literal enough. I hope soon to go to Germany, as I cannot stand the climate of England; incessant headaches make any fatiguing work impossible.'

Two days later he writes to his mother:—

Translation.

GRANGE, DERWENTWATER, July 28.

'I have been for a fortnight in this beautiful country, with two great friends, who were going to spend their holidays here, and asked me to go with them. We take long walks every day on the mountains, or row on the lakes, or ride, which we enjoy very much. I was knocked up with incessant work, but I feel perfectly well since I came here, and hope soon to be able to return to Oxford. The beauty of England is so great that one cannot understand why the English always go to the Continent in search of beautiful scenery. There is nothing so beautiful as being alone with nature: one sees how God's will is fulfilled in each bud and leaf that blooms and withers, and one learns to recognize how deeply rooted in one is this thirst for nature. In living with men, one is only too easily torn from this real home; then one's own plans and wishes and hopes and fears spring up; then we fancy we can perfect something for ourselves alone, and think that everything must serve for our ends and enjoyments, until the influence of nature in life or the hand of God arouses us, and warns us that we live and flourish, not for enjoyment, nor for undisturbed quiet, but to bear fruit in another life. When one stands amid the grandeur of nature, with one's own little murmurs and sufferings, and looks deep into this dumb soul, much becomes clear to one, and one is astounded at the false ideas one has formed of this life. It is but a short journey, and on a journey one can do without many things which generally seem necessary to us. Yes, one can do without even what is dearest to our hearts, in this world, if we know that after the journey which we have to endure we shall find again those who have arrived at the goal quicker and more easily than we have done. Now if life were looked upon as a journey for refreshment or amusement, which it ought not to be, we might feel sad, if we have to make our way alone; but if we treat it as a serious business-journey, then we know we have hard and unpleasant work before us, and enjoy all the more the beautiful resting-places which God's love has provided for each of us in life. We have all of us, in these last years, had such a long rest, and enjoyed life so quietly, that now, when we have to fight on again, we have quite forgotten that our power for fighting was meant for something more than parades and reviews.

Look how the true soldier rejoices when a real battle is at hand, and so the true man should rejoice, when God calls him to an earnest life struggle; and when the last friends fall right and left, one goes into the conflict with yet more determined courage to gain that object which is set before each of us. You may think this too serious a view of life: I assure you it is this view of life which has given me my cheerful spirit, and helps to keep it up, and which makes it possible for me with firm faith to contemplate fearlessly the struggles of life that are still before me. The one thing I desire and hope is that God will give me strength to maintain my independence by unremitting work, so that I may always pursue that way in life which according to my convictions appears the right one. If God gives me more, and it is granted me to lead a quiet and happy life with you, it is more than I deserve. But courage—nothing can happen to us in life, but what is really the best for us. And now for my plans. I have about 100 pages more to print, which may be ready in six weeks. Then I shall go to Germany and spend the winter with you, wherever you like. I shall look about in Germany, to see if I can find a place in any University, preferably at Bonn, and see if it would be possible to prepare my MS. in Germany, and to come over every year for a short time to England for the printing. That would be delightful—but I won't build any castles in the air, as there is much to consider. If this does not answer I would return to England, and you could come and visit me. Then I should alter my plans and build my hopes on England and on finding a post here, where you could be quite comfortable, and live with me and keep house. The longer one lives in England, the more one longs to be back in Germany. A stormy is better than a dead sea! The English grow more like the Chinese with each year, and nature herself has built a Chinese wall round their lovely country. But if one makes oneself into a Chinaman, one gets on well with them.'

He writes to Dr. Pauli from Borrowdale:—

Translation.

'The neighbourhood here is glorious, and we are just in from a walk with old Morier. We can jump out of our windows into the water, we fish for trout, and smoke a weed. Then there are boats, ponies, carts, and no living soul except dogs and sheep, and an old farmer's family with a lingo which is difficult to understand. I shall stay some time, and wish you could come here, for it is really unique, and whilst I write I hear the sound of waterfalls on all sides, for they are swollen by late rains. Froude lives close by, and I am going to stay with him. Mary Barton, Miss Martineau, and other literary swells live about here—and the Veda may see how it can do without me.'

Whilst at the Lakes Max Müller copied out his treatise on the 'Results of the Investigations of Language as to Ancient History,' forming part of the Prolegomena to the Veda, which he sent to M. Burnouf for the competition for the Prix Volney. In writing to acknowledge the safe arrival of the MS., Burnouf says :—

Translation.

'We shall need all the forces at our disposal, for the number of competitors is large, and from what I hear powerful, and many of these will be supported by very active friends. I have been entrusted with the first examination of your Essay, and shall receive it to-day. But if we must fight, we will fight—you know we French do not fear blows, we like them, alas! only too much. Good-bye, my dear friend. Take care of your health. I am very sorry to hear that it has suffered from overwork. But to work, one must live.'

To Dr. Pauli he writes after leaving the Lakes :—

Translation.

August 24, 1849.

'I have at last finished my holiday, and yet, long as it was, did not get to Scotland. But we amused ourselves to the last day. I was a fortnight with Froude, boating, and fishing, and whatever other amusements there are, whereby we grow older but not wiser. Morier and Jowett are gone to the Isle of Man, but my old love, the Veda, drew me back to Oxford.'

On returning to Oxford he found his friend Dr. Acland contending almost single-handed with a serious outbreak of cholera. It was the depth of Long Vacation, the members of the University were away, and most of the medical men taking their summer holiday. Max Müller put himself at his friend's disposal, and worked with him in tracing out cases, attending to the sick and giving relief, till he himself nearly succumbed to a sharp attack, and Dr. Acland would not allow him to do any more visiting. On recovering he writes to Bunsen :—

Translation.

'I enclose a letter from M. Reinaud for you to read. I think I can now feel pretty confident of receiving the prize. I am delighted at the result, and feel how much more good comes to me than I have ever deserved. But I will now begin again to work in all earnest, if God gives me health, which has again in these last weeks lost me much time, and German air will, I hope, prove better medicine than all I have been swallowing here.'

In September his old friend Victor Carus arrived, and settled in the same house with Max Müller. They breakfasted together, and then separated for their work, Carus working at Christ Church, and they dined together, when not asked to dine out. Carus finally left Oxford at Easter, 1851, but he had been absent for many months of the time, working in the Scilly Isles, and the last few months of his stay in Oxford he lived in Dr. Acland's house, so that the friends were really less together than they had expected.

Early in October came the welcome news that he had gained the Prix Volney. Burnouf writes:—

Translation.

PARIS, October 5, 1849.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,—I hasten to announce to you, that on my report, the Commission of the Institute, who have to adjudge the annual prize founded by M. de Volney, has accorded you the first prize of 1,200 francs. A second prize of 1,000 francs has been awarded to another work, curious in fact, but not sufficiently serious in form. I held that the first prize must be adjudged you, as much for the merit of your work, as for the dignity of those great studies, of which, in a very short time, you will be one of the chief ornaments. No one can feel greater pleasure than I do in announcing your success to you. Everybody entertained the kindest feelings towards you. Remember, you are not to mention your success before the 25th, as it is not till that day that the prizes are announced at the public séance. Your devoted friend,

'E. B.'

And now, after four years of labour in collecting the materials, the first volume of the Hymns of the Rig-veda, with Sâyana's Commentary, was printed and nearly ready for publication. The text had been prepared from MSS. in the Bibliothèque Royale of Paris, the East India House, and the Bodleian Library, for in the whole of Germany no MSS. were to be found, except some very old and imperfect copies of the text and a few worm-eaten fragments of Sâyana at Berlin. The MSS. in France and England had been collated and copied by Max Müller's own hand, entirely without help. The MSS. of Sâyana were most imperfect, made by copyists who did not understand their subject, and were therefore full of mistakes, which had all to be rectified to produce a correct text. It abounds moreover in obscure quotations, and many of the works quoted had not been edited at this time, and yet every quotation had to be verified and explained. It was a gigantic undertaking for so young a scholar, and in his preface he gratefully acknowledges the constant encouragement he had received from men like Burnouf and Wilson, and the readiness with which the librarians of the public libraries in Paris, London, and Oxford spread their treasures before him, whilst Burnouf and Dr. Mill generously placed their private collection of MSS. at his service, and Dr. Rieu, Sub-Librarian of the British Museum, aided in the correction of the proof-sheets of this volume.

So after three years of absence he was able to hurry off to his own family, with the restful feeling that he had well earned his longed-for holiday. He thus takes leave of Bunsen :—

Translation.

LONDON, October 20, 1849.

‘In the hurry of my journey it is not possible to answer your kind letter, which is very precious to me. Your confidence in me gives me fresh courage, and an earnest resolution to work on bravely; but do not expect too much from me, that I may not fall too far short of your expectations. The love of science and desire of distinction are often too weak to overcome the vis inertiae and the longing for rest and retirement, especially in these days of barbarism, of mental poverty and godlessness, where one finds no hearing for research, let alone the hope of starting anything useful. I owe you much, very much, were it only that the thought of you keeps alive in me the love of duty, and the desire to win the approbation of good men.’

Immediately on his arrival in Berlin Max Müller sought out his friend and patron, Alexander von Humboldt, who continued to the end to take a deep interest in the scholar whom he remembered from his Berlin student-days. Unfortunately all the letters from Max Müller to Humboldt have disappeared, but permission has been given to use one or two of Humboldt's notes to Max, though there is nothing of special interest in them, as showing his friendly feelings towards the young Sanskritist.

Translation.

POTSDAM, November 2, 1849.

‘It is with the greatest joy that I greet again on German soil so talented and industrious a scholar as Dr. Max Müller. An unforeseen absence from home robbed me the other day of the joy of your visit. I expect you, therefore, the day after to-morrow, Friday, between 1 and 2 o’clock, if that suits you. The Prolegomena to the Veda will be of the greatest interest to me, and I shall hand it to the public with pleasure, if you wish me to do so. With kindest regards, yours,

‘A. v. HUMBOLDT.’

From Berlin Max Müller writes to his friend and master Burnouf:—

9, SCHADOW STRASSE, BERLIN, November 8.

‘DEAR SIR,—My best thanks for your kind letter. You can imagine how happy I am, after having received from the French Academy this unexpected distinction, but what gives to this distinction its highest value is that this honour has been bestowed on my essay on your recommendation. I knew very well your kind intentions towards me, and was persuaded that I should find in you a kind judge. But I was also too well acquainted with your character, to expect that your kindness for me could exercise any influence on those principles on which you act. Having received therefore this prize through you, I think I have solid reason to feel happy about it, and to consider it as a good omen for my future studies. The first volume of the Rig-veda has at last appeared. I left it finished before I went to Germany, and though I am afraid there will be some delay by the bookbinder, bookseller, &c., I hope you will soon receive a copy of it at Paris. I have not yet given up my plan of coming to Paris, before I return to England. There are many things connected with the Veda, which I have treated in my Prolegomena to the Veda, on which I should like very much to hear your opinion before it is printed. I hope no other Revolution will come between it, as the last time when I came to Paris, for I see also here at Berlin that revolutions leave the minds of men not in a favourable disposition for discussing questions connected with the history of bygone nations. I hope your health will soon be entirely restored, and I shall find you again at your morning upanishads, animated by the same lively interest, and with the same warmth of discussion and conversation, as three or four years ago.

‘Believe me, dear sir,

‘Yours very gratefully and faithfully,

‘M. MÜLLER.’

From Berlin he writes again to Bunsen :—

Translation.

BERLIN, November 12, 1849.

‘After spending a short time in Dresden and Leipzig, I have come to Berlin, and my mother with me, and shall stay here till Christmas. I have found many of my old friends here, and satiated with politics the interest in scientific pursuits seems to be slowly reviving. The feeling of dejection in Prussia and Germany is great, and the good see with dismay that the pendulum of the State machinery, which in March was swung too far to the left, now, with the same want of caution, is swung too far to the right. That from that point there will again be a reaction every one seems to forget. They fancy they can hold the pendulum fast to the right, forgetting that either the clockwork must break, or the weight must fall back with the same force. Yesterday, I received a letter from Oxford, in which I am told that my Oxford friends are taking pains to secure me a place in the British Museum, and have written to you about it. It is the place of Keeper of the Oriental MSS., with £450 income. I shall not stand for the place: the tastes of the late librarian led him to collect a wealth of Arabic, Syriac, and Persian MSS., but Indian and Old Persian were totally neglected. I should not suit the place, but might not Rieu get it? His knowledge exactly fits him for it, and this appointment would assure his whole future and be a great advantage to science. Lepsius is very well, and is just going to bring out another volume, chiefly drawings. Lepsia, too, and Lepsiuncula are well. Bopp is just the same, unchanged; but one cannot expect anything more from him for Sanskrit. It is to be hoped that Weber by his work will soon gain a Professorship, not only in his own interest, but also for the sake of his work. I have not yet seen Humboldt; he is in Potsdam, and I will wait till I have received the copies of the Rig-veda. I am going to-day to the Chamber for the first time. The seats in the Chamber are already getting empty, and ennui will do more service than a state of siege. To see men like Dahlmann<sup>1</sup> taking a part in these transactions is really sad. He is too good an historian to be a politician. I occupy myself here with the revision of my Prolegomena; I cannot alter it much more. Yours in true devotion.’

<sup>1</sup> Died 1860.

CHAPTER VII

1850-1851

Dinner at Potsdam. Morier's illness. Return to Oxford. Rauch. Waagen. Appointed to lecture at Oxford. Letters from Professors Cowell and Story-Maskelyne. Visit to Froude. Article in Edinburgh Review. Made Deputy Professor and Honorary M.A.

AFTER a pleasant Christmas at Chemnitz with his mother and sister, where also his friend Morier joined him, Max Müller, with Morier, returned to Berlin, where the latter meant to spend some months studying German. Max writes to his mother from Berlin :—

Translation.

BERLIN, Jan. 30.

‘I am very comfortable with Goldstücker, but I am tired of being idle, and am longing to be back in Oxford now I am no longer with you. I have been visiting old friends, Bettina von Arnim and Varnhagen ; they have both become red republicans.’

He had met Humboldt, who told him that the King had expressed a wish to see him before he returned to England, and soon after brought him a command to dine at Potsdam. He sends his mother a lively account of the dinner :—

Translation.

BERLIN, Feb. 2, 1850.

‘DEAREST MOTHER,—I must tell you all about my visit to the King. Early Friday came a messenger from the palace to invite me to dinner at Charlottenburg, and at 2.30 Humboldt came in his carriage to take me there. He told me it would be quite a small party, but when we arrived we found about thirty people already assembled, and we all waited for the King. Humboldt introduced me to various people, and the ladies and gentlemen of the Court were evidently much surprised at my presence, as I was the only man without epaulets and about ten Orders. At last came the King and Queen. I was again the only person who had not yet been presented. So I was taken through all the ladies and gentlemen and presented to His Majesty. "Brahma is great, but fear not!" I thought, as I looked at the King, only separated from me by his mountainous embonpoint. He asked me where I was born, and told me that in the Dessau library he had seen the poet Müller. Then he talked of the Duchess, and at last asked how I liked England, and then saying "Wünsche Ihnen guten Appetit" (I wish you a good appetite), bowed and dismissed me. Then the Queen came up to me, and was asking me about the Duchess, when the King hurried up to her, gave her his arm, saying as Berlin wit, "Monsieur, s'il vous plaît, dinner is served." Then we went into the next room. I sat between two officers, and enjoyed my dinner, which was a very good one. I took the liberty of letting my knife and fork go with each course, till I remarked that the servants looked askance, and then I saw to my great surprise that the ladies and gentlemen round me eat everything with the same knife and fork! What to do? to imitate them? No, I went quietly on to the last dish, and let the footmen and my neighbours and vis-à-vis think of me what they pleased; but I was amused. After dinner we had coffee in quite a small room. The King came up to me again, and asked if I knew English, and other kindly questions, and then joined the Queen. I had some talk with some of the Gentlemen in Waiting, Count Pückler, &c.; then their Majesties went away, and I drove home with Humboldt. He was very sorry that the party had been so large, but said the King was so much occupied it was difficult to see him alone. It amused me very much to have this peep into the royal circle, and it may be useful to me later on. Humboldt was delightful. I have been busy for him on the names of the Dogstar in Sanskrit, which he will mention in Cosmos. That is better than dining with the King, but I knew you would want me to describe it all, but you must not repeat it to everybody. I am often afraid on this account of telling you everything when I write. There was no talk of an Order, which would do me more harm than good.'

Max Müller had arranged to leave Berlin directly after the dinner at Potsdam, but his friend Morier was taken suddenly ill with quinsy, and he was obliged to stay on and nurse him through a most alarming attack, and it was not till quite the end of February that he was able to start for Paris, where he received his 1,200 frs. for the Prix Volney and saw Burnouf and many of his old French friends.

Meantime Professor Wilson—always a cold, hard man, unable to enter readily into the difficulties and engagements of other people where they were contrary to his own views—became very impatient for his return, and wrote to him as follows :—

OXFORD, Feb. 26, 1850.

‘MY DEAR MÜLLER,—I had hoped to have seen you in Oxford on the occasion of my visit there, but it is now drawing to a close, and I understand there is no prospect of your early arrival. I regret this much, as unless we can proceed a little quicker than we have done with the printing of the Rig-veda, I fear I shall scarcely live to see it finished, in time at least to finish the translation ; unless I do as Langlois has done, and go to work upon the MSS. only. In that case I should have to walk off with all the India House copies, and leave you to the Bodleian alone. The only other expedient I can think of is to summon some other Vaidik—Roth, for instance—to your help ; but seriously I wish you would soon resume your labours. It is high time to put a stop to all the wild fancies that a partial knowledge of the light and a reliance upon such equivocal guides as the Brâhmanas and Sûtras seem likely to engender. I want you also to help in the distribution of the copies. I have the Court’s sanction to the presentation of above 100 copies to different public bodies and eminent individuals both here and abroad. If I cannot expect your assistance in carrying this sanction into effect, I must do as well as I can without it, but it is a task that will give me some trouble. I have finished the translation, and printed about half of it. It will be completed, I hope, in about six weeks. Trithen and your other Oxford friends are all well, and will be glad to see you again amongst them. Yours sincerely,

‘H. H. WILSON.’

Max Müller had written from Paris to his mother :—

March 8.

‘It was an unfortunate thing being kept in Berlin, but I have the happy feeling that I was doing what was right, and so I must be satisfied.’

He was scarcely settled in Oxford before he writes to Bunsen :—

Translation.

March, 1850.

‘My best thanks for your friendly welcome to England. I hope your health has not suffered from the various efforts and excitements of your journey to Germany. I have seen with great interest in the publication of the Prussian Circular Note the realization of the ideas to which you gave expression before the end of last year. And so, suddenly, the Gordian knot of the Austrian diplomatic tow-rope is cut to pieces, and Prussia at last appears as primus inter pares. That the idea of an Emperor is put down as a possible impossibility is sad, but as it had become a subject of scandal it was better to give it up. Should the thunder-clouds of civil war really burst over Germany, the German Emperor would come, not from Schmerling or Gagern, but by the grace of God. How much I wish to see you, how many questions I would gladly have answered! But your invitation now in the midst of all your business is too much for me to accept, though I cannot be certain that a strong influence may not drive me to London for a few hours. I am expecting a lot of MSS. from India, which I have bought for myself, as I did not think that the Berlin Library would receive permission for such things at this moment. I am in direct correspondence with the Asiatic Society in Calcutta. My old Veda is a real comfort to me, despite all the wearisomeness of the difficult and yet mechanical work of revision, but it will require much time and labour before the end is possible. Mr. Langlois, Professor of Rhetoric, has made the task much easier to himself. Without commentary, and, as he proudly says, without philological considerations, he has translated the Veda straight away very cavalièrement: the two first books have just appeared at Didot's. One cannot enter into discussion with a man of this sort, and yet it is provoking, for the book is easy to read, and from the first page will give ideas of the Veda which will afterwards cost much trouble to remove, just as people now use and quote the translation of the Ezour-veda by Voltaire. An approximate translation of the Veda can be made, and I believe that even Wilson's English translation will only be approximate. And yet if I had to wait ten years, I would not translate a single line till the whole Vedic antiquity with its wealth of thought lay clearly before me. If you take a hymn from the last book of the Rig-veda interesting for social considerations and moral ideas, as a whole it is clear, but the sequence of ideas is very difficult. Forgive this long scrawl. You need not read it all, and to-morrow is Ash Wednesday, when all diplomatists must do special penance for last year. The poor Pope must cover his head with ashes, and the new Roman Commonwealth will be a common misery. Gioberti seems to have had his day of Damascus, and wishes to make himself an Italian Gagern. The worst are always the best when once the scales fall from their eyes. They won't believe this in Berlin, but Messrs. Brandenburg, &c., are really too good for these bad times.'

Max Müller devoted nearly all the year after his return from Germany to the Veda, and only gave himself a few days' rest from time to time, as he continued to find the Oxford climate very trying. He writes to his mother:—

Translation.

OXFORD, April 26, 1850.

‘One thing is necessary above all things in order to live peaceably with people, that is in Latin humanitas, German Menschlichkeit. It is difficult to describe, but it is to claim as little as possible from others, neither an obliging temper nor gratitude, and yet to do all one can to please others, yet without expecting them always to find it out. As men are made up of contradictions, they are the more grateful and friendly the less they see that we expect gratitude and friendliness. Even the least cultivated people have their good points, and it is not only far better, but far more interesting if one takes trouble to find out the best side and motives of people, rather than the worst and most selfish. I write to you what I have often said to myself when I was brought in contact with strangers, and because I find that on the whole I get on well with them. This may appear very artificial, but life is an art, and more difficult than Sanskrit or anything else. A kindly nature can win us by taking pains, but an unkind nature fails, notwithstanding all art and cunning. I am so busy that one day goes after another. I hardly see any one; then I have caught cold, and have constant toothache and headache. But one must faire bonne mine à mauvais jeu, and if we have no one to pour out our ills to, we must get on as well as we can. I meant to write sooner, but I have been out of sorts the whole time.’

To Bunsen, who had begged him to go ‘with bag and baggage to 9, Carlton Terrace, to one who longs to see’ him, he writes:—

Translation.

OXFORD, May 17, 1850.

‘How gladly would I accept your kind invitation; the hours I am allowed to spend with you are not only the happiest, but the most instructive and most remunerative; but I have sold my freedom and made myself a day labourer, so at all events I must not leave the cart sticking fast as long as it is in human power to move it. I have a section of MS. ready, which I can print with a good conscience. What will happen later I don’t yet know myself, but hope for an interim fit aliquid. I hope, however, to make myself free for a couple of days as soon as I can—that is, as soon as Wilson leaves; he comes next week to Oxford for his lectures. I have heard nothing of Froude for a long time, except that he is very happily married. I don’t believe he is the author of any “red and raw” articles, and as far as I can discover he has only written one literary article for the Leader, but I cannot answer for this, as I don't know the paper. I cannot get Rawlinson's treatise. His brother says he told him that you are the only person in London with whom he can talk about Babylon.'

A little later we find Max Müller paying a visit to Morier's father and mother at Bath. He was delighted with the place, and still more with the affection shown by the old people to one to whose devoted nursing their only son owed his life—a debt of gratitude never forgotten by any member of the family, who all remained his faithful friends till called away before him one after another.

TO F. PALGRAVE, ESQ.

9, PARK PLACE, OXFORD, June 18, 1850.

'MY DEAR PALGRAVE,—I hope I shall be able to get away from Oxford about the end of this week, so if you can give me a bed I should like to come to Kneller Hall on Friday or Saturday. I am thoroughly tired of Oxford, and hope I shall feel jollier again when we sit together on your tower and smoke a weed; but no In Memoriam, rather something about airy, fairy Lilians and other sweet creatures without a soul. However, I do not mean to say that Tennyson's last poems are not very beautiful, yet I do not like those open graves of sorrow and despair, and wish our poets would imitate the good Christian fashion of covering them with flowers, or a stone with a short inscription on it.'

From Kneller Hall Max Müller went for a week to Bunsen, from whom he always gathered fresh courage for his hard work and more or less lonely life. Of this visit Max Müller tells his mother:—

Translation.

OXFORD, July 22, 1850.

'I met Rauch the sculptor in London, who was staying at Bunsen's: a really delightful old man, who lives only for the beautiful, and has no eyes for anything else. He came to Oxford with me, and was quite enchanted with it, and I enjoyed it more than ever with him. He was quite ill with the wealth of the buildings, monuments, churches, halls and pictures, and the beauty of the scenery, and really when seeing the most striking things he seemed hardly able to control himself. One day I went with him to Blenheim. . . . Later on I had a visit from Professor Waagen, the Director of the Berlin Museum, and one of the best German connoisseurs of art; I had to show him about. Then came Professor Ennemoser from Munich, and lastly George Bunsen, who only left me yesterday. He sings beautifully, and we had a great deal of music.'

From the following letter it is evident that his Vedic studies were beginning to attract general attention, and that an article on the subject was desired for one of the great Quarterly Reviews:—

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, OXFORD, July, 1850.

'YOUR EXCELLENCY,—I feel much refreshed spiritually by having been in your presence, which always acts like fresh spring rain on dusty fields; physically I feel better, though I cannot say well yet, and though the body ought to be subject to the spirit, still the spirit has only too often to follow the lead of the body.

With regard to Empson's and Dr. Wilson's letters, it is difficult to advise. I have no doubt whatever, that something can be written about the Veda which would reach even the dumbest ears. Whether Dr. Wilson can undertake that task is another question. You know the dry hard shell in which the Veda is presented to us, and which seems still harder and more wooden in the English translation. Nevertheless I of course shall be glad if the Rig-veda is dealt with in the Edinburgh Review, and if Wilson would write from the standpoint of a missionary, and would show how the knowledge and bringing into light of the Veda would upset the whole existing system of Indian theology, it might become of real interest.'

Only a few days after writing the above, Max Müller heard from Bunsen that Eastwick, the translator of Bopp's Comparative Grammar, wished for a review of it in the Quarterly, and urging him to undertake it. This is the first mention of the article which appeared ultimately in the Edinburgh Review in October, 1851, and which was the first of several articles written by Max Müller for that periodical.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

OXFORD, July 14, 1850.

'I accept with pleasure the proposal with regard to an article on Bopp's Comparative Grammar, translated by Eastwick, and thank you for it. I must ask you to be good enough to assure Mr. Lockhart of my readiness. I do not think that a short review will cost much time and labour, and if you will allow me, next week, when I shall be in London for a few days, I will call and get some directions and hints from you. God help Schleswig-Holstein, and not punish Prussia in His wrath. If the Schleswig-Holsteiners are conquered and annihilated, they have fought for their rights and have fallen gloriously on the field of honour, after the will of history. But if a power, to which all Europe has offered the leading position, allows itself to be intimidated by the threats of the Danes and Russians, and withdraws a given promise, that is worse than a retreat before a battle.'

Two days later he writes to Palgrave:—

9, PARK PLACE, OXFORD, July 16, 1850.

'MY DEAR PALGRAVE,—If you have ever amused yourself in spending a whole Long Vacation in Oxford—of which I do not think you have ever been guilty—you would know that it is more like purgatory than anything else. Yet here I am, and I cannot get away on account of one miserable MS. which I must go and look at every day while I am carrying my Rig-veda through the Press. I should have liked very much to spend a few weeks with you and Froude, and I have tried everything to accomplish my plan, but it was impossible without stopping my work altogether, which for many reasons I could not do. I shall be tied to Oxford for a month or two longer—a pleasant prospect, as then the fine season will be over, and no chance left for refreshing one's soul except in the cold weather. However, it is no use writing epistolae ex Ponto! I am glad to hear that Froude gets on so well, and that his choice has been such a happy one. Johnson is back, and looks very joyful, as well as his bride. Professor Waagen is staying with him, and I am sure you would enjoy their conversation. I can only admire their skill in admiring the most ugly, stiff and out of joint pictures: however, such is art.'

From the very moment that his own position became tolerably settled by the patronage bestowed on his Rig-veda by the East India Company, Max Müller was always trying to help others in some respects less fortunate than himself. A long correspondence exists as to the place of German teacher at Rugby, which he tried in 1849 to secure for Dr. Pauli. Soon after the latter became private secretary to Bunsen, Max heard of a place vacant at the University of Berlin, and writes to Pauli:—

Translation.

'If Bunsen is interested about it, he should not forget Weber. He is older than —, and has done more, and then has a wife and child. Please do not forget to mention this.'

And in the following letter, whilst presenting his father's poems to Bunsen, he tries to do another friend a good turn :—

Translation.

OXFORD, October 9, 1850.

‘I am sending the new edition of my father’s poems which I brought out during my German “Winter-journey.” There are many new things in it, and I trust the work will help to keep alive the memory of the poet who died so early! You have spoken of him to me so often, and in a manner so grateful to my feelings, that it is a great pleasure to be allowed to send you this new edition. Then I wish to ask your advice. I visited Froude this week to make the acquaintance of his wife and daughter. He is thinking of an article on German poetry since Goethe. He has collected some good material, especially very successful translations from Uhland, Heine, and a few poems of my father’s. Do you think that the Quarterly would open its columns to an article on Uhland, Müller, Heine, Lenau, &c., and is it too much to ask you to persuade Lockhart to take such an article? It is quite understood that the subject would be treated purely from the historical and aesthetic point of view.’

Towards the end of this year, after an almost continuous summer of labour at the Veda, Max Müller was seized with a sudden feeling of utter weariness of England and his life here, and writes to Bunsen :—

Translation.

OXFORD, November, 1850.

‘As soon as I received your letter I wrote to Froude. I do not think that he can write as comprehensive an article as you describe. What he could best write would be a small genre picture of German lyric poetry since Goethe, the time when the old man tripped over the roots of the trees he had himself planted; an estimate of the (compared with Goethe) poetae mediocres to whom with Horace one willingly denies all right to existence, because they have never, like Homer, Dante, Goethe, and Byron, visited the devil in hell. If Froude once left this sphere to sketch a picture of the mental and religious struggles of the Fatherland since Goethe, he would from want of accurate knowledge fall into extremes; and the Edinburgh, which is not far behind the Quarterly in anti-German feeling, would be closed against him. The prospects for Germans in England get steadily worse: happy he who can live in his own land. Things look very grey. The conferences in Bregenz and Warsaw have made a new revolution a duty for every German, and those who are by nature inclined to a bouleversement modéré rub their hands. But a stormy sea also is splendid, and shows who are true men. We must expect that some of our stately steersmen will be seasick, but there are men who fear neither wind nor weather, and who do not think that Germany's peace is too dear to buy at any price. I am thinking of writing to Lassen to ask him whether he can employ me in Bonn. I am heartily tired of England, and if there is nothing in Germany I will try India. My work is entirely at a standstill, my MSS. from India lost for the second time by the shipwreck of the Manchester. I must therefore come to a decision. The problem of the Egyptian language occupies me very much, but it is difficult to find guiding principles when the comparison depends on the mere mass, not on the organization of the language. Benfey's researches prove the Semitic character of the Egyptian grammar beyond all doubt, and much will become simpler and clearer by the old Egyptian grammar. But in the comparison of words with the Indo-European, we expose ourselves to many dangers, especially as long as a sufficient number of Indo-European, or rather common roots in Semitic also, are not authenticated. To-morrow Wilson comes to Oxford, with whom I have a good deal to discuss; then a decision must be made as to beginning a new life.'

Bunsen's answer came by return of post: 'Your letter has frightened me by what you tell me of your strong impulse to go to Bonn or Benares. This is the very worst moment for Bonn. . . . The crisis in our country disturbs everything,' and ends by urging him to go up to London at once and stay at the Legation. To this Max replied:—

Translation.

OXFORD, November 5, 1850.

'How willingly would I have accepted your invitation to London, were I not kept by two lectures which take up my whole time, one on astronomy by Professor Donkin, and another by Wilson to learn Hindûstânî. An interruption would throw me out too much, especially in the astronomy, which I can only follow by the closest attention. I have spoken to Wilson; he advises me to stay in England, or to go to India, but I do not think he would make difficulties if I had a definite purpose in Germany, that is if I could tell him that I really expected a position in a University. Therefore I think it is best first to hear Lassen's views, to know whether he would recommend the faculty in Bonn to give me an appointment, or whether he would rather keep Sanskrit to himself. I am quite ready to stay another year here, to print my Introduction, but I should like to have a certain prospect and not live on at random. My early Oxford friends, with whom I felt at home, leave this one after another, and it is not worth while to make new acquaintances. And then in spite of all disorders and crises I am drawn back towards Germany, or if I must live in a foreign country, I would rather go to the Antipodes than live in suspense in England. That I am not in my right place here, I know and feel more each day. So away, and the sooner the better, and God will help me further.

‘Wilson received a letter from Benares the other day, which says that the learned Brâhmans there shook their heads mightily at first, but now, after having received and read a specimen of 200 pages, they are highly pleased with the edition of the Veda. They have settled among themselves, and it is common talk in Benares, that a colony of Germans will come and settle there, and turn Brâhmans. So if all my plans fail, I may perhaps find a refuge there.’

It was in the very midst of all this uncertainty that he was asked by the Curators of the Taylor Institution to undertake two courses of lectures as deputy for his friend Trithen, who had suddenly fallen into a state of melancholia, quite incapacitating him from work. He tells his mother on December 14:—

Translation.

‘I received for my birthday a quite unexpected present, a letter from the University asking me to lecture in the place of Trithen, who is very ill. He lectures on modern literature and languages. I cannot say I care very much for it, as it must break into my other work, but as my Oxford friends and also Bunsen were very anxious I should undertake it, I wrote to accept. The first course will be on the History and Origin of Modern Languages, and the second on the Nibelungen. If they make me a Professor, I shall not object to it, though I should prefer a German Professorship. Well, we shall see.’

Though wishing Max Müller to accept the offer to lecture in Oxford, Bunsen had written to him on December 18, urging him to pay a flying visit to Bonn before Christmas to see what the prospects there were, adding: ‘As a friend of many years’ standing, you will forgive me if I say, if the journey to Bonn is not financially convenient to you just now, I depend on your thinking of me.’

To this letter Max replied:—

Translation.

OXFORD, December 13, 1850.

‘Many thanks for the kind sympathy which, even in the storm and stress of these evil times, you, an always faithful friend, have shown me. I quite acknowledge how well it would have been had I been able myself to reconnoitre the position at Bonn. But before I received George's answer, I had written to Lassen, to ask his advice in this affair. So I could not change things; the first impression had been made, and could hardly be altered by my cursory presence. I will now quietly await what he writes, and have meantime accepted the Oxford invitation to give two courses of lectures. I only hope they won't cost too much time, for if I go to Bonn at Michaelmas, and wish first to finish the second volume of the Rig-veda, and the Prolegomena in which a Latin catalogue of the Bodleian MSS. is to appear, I have my hands full. If Lassen makes difficulties I must decide to stay in England, till a kindly fate leads me out of the Oxford hermit's cell, into free German air, or into a forest solitude in India. Here is the review to which you were good enough to promise your powerful recommendation. I should be very glad if the Edinburgh would take it, but I am afraid I have hardly hit off the right tone, though I tried hard in writing it to think of ladies uninterruptedly. The advice "think of a lady whilst you are writing" does not come direct from Lockhart, whom I never saw, but from Eastwick, whom Lockhart taught.'

Among the references which the Taylorian Curators received before they appointed Max Müller as a deputy for Trithen, the following was sent in by Wilson. Though it in no way guarantees Max's gifts as a lecturer on Modern European Languages, it shows what Wilson, the Nestor of Sanskritists as he has been called, thought of his young friend as a Sanskrit scholar:—

November, 1850.

'His knowledge of the Sanskrit language I regard as most comprehensive and critical, and displaying a more than usual familiarity with the principles of its structure as established by native grammarians. I consider him also as extensively conversant with the general literature of the Hindus, especially with that part which relates to their traditions, institutes, and laws, and I look upon him as without an equal in that interesting and important department of it to which he has particularly devoted his attention, the Literature of the Vedas, the study of their ancient texts, and of the many voluminous and difficult subsidiary compositions which are indispensable for their elucidation.'

Of Max Müller's position at Oxford, even in these early days, Canon Farrar gives an interesting account:—

'The first time when I met him, was at dinner in the Hall at Balliol about 1850. At that time, before society in Oxford was broken up into sets during the transitional period of University reform, there were hardly any private dinners. Certain days each week were assigned in each College for inviting graduate friends from other Colleges to the high table. On the night in question I was dining with Jowett, and Max Müller with Walrond. Though the talk during dinner was not strictly literary, some point of literature turned up, and Müller's opinion on it was asked across the table by Walrond. Instantly there was silence among the twenty men at table. All listened to this stripling (as he appeared). Stanley, who was sitting next to me, and who had been discussing the memoir of Sterling, stopped and listened attentively. Müller replied to the question with great modesty, though with self-possession, and with a brevity which allowed conversation to flow back soon into its previous course. I instantly asked Jowett who he was, and learnt that he was a young German of great promise who had been in Oxford for about two years and was employed in editing the oldest Sanskrit literature. I name this as a sign of the profound respect which at so early a period was shown to him in an élite society like that of Balliol.'

Christmas of this year was spent in Oxford, though Bunsen had invited his young friend again to Totteridge, but Max had already promised Victor Carus that they should spend it together; and he tells his mother they had a tree, and gave each other many presents, and with Belle's assistance passed as happy an evening as they could with their thoughts far away in their German homes.

The year 1851 was the determining point of Max Müller's future life. Forced to continue his stay at Oxford, to print the Rig-veda, he found it necessary to have some other means of support than the Veda alone, in order to live the rather expensive life of a young man in Oxford society. This was found for him in the invitation to lecture in his friend Trithen's place. At first he was only asked to give two courses of lectures, but they were so well attended and made such an impression, that he was invited to continue his task, and was appointed Deputy Professor as soon as it became apparent that Trithen was hopelessly ill, and on his death was elected to succeed him in the Taylorian Professorship. The close of this year too saw his first connexion with the Edinburgh Review, and from this time on he added to his income by constant contributions to various periodicals in England and Germany, and some years later in America also.

About his article for the Edinburgh he writes to Bunsen :—

Translation.

OXFORD, January 27, 1851.

‘I have been waiting for Stanley’s return, to talk to him about the article for the Edinburgh. He tells me he can write neither a head nor a tail to it: he thinks it wants no head, though a tail might perhaps be useful. Jowett and Morier have promised me to provide the perhaps needed additions; I think Stanley is too busy and has no time for it. If you agree to this, and will show me the friendly service of sending my MS. to Empson with a few words, the thing can perhaps be carried through, and I believe it will be of great use to me here in Oxford. My lectures are written, and your kindly advice as far as possible followed. Jowett is now Select Preacher, and preached an excellent sermon last Sunday. I hope he will publish it with the others. Even the heathen acknowledge it was beautiful language. Sir R. Inglis was present, but seemed little edified.’

To his mother he wrote the same day :—

Translation.

OXFORD, January 27, 1851.

‘I went to London lately to a party at Bunsen’s, most interesting, where I met Macaulay, the historian and former Minister, Lord Mahon, Radowitz, and many other celebrities. Old Bunsen is always cheerful, and studies Egyptian and Chinese to drive politics out of his head. In a fortnight my lectures begin. I have only undertaken them for six months, but Bunsen persuades me strongly to remain, and I am thinking it over carefully. If I undertake it entirely I should have £400 a year for giving twenty-four lectures, and more than half the year vacation. I could go on with the Veda, and should have an income of about £600, with which one can live well in Oxford, and then you could come and pay me a visit for as long as you liked. But do not talk about it—it is all still uncertain, and I have not myself determined to take it, but would far rather be a Professor in Germany, if I could only at the same time carry on printing the Veda, for that is still my chief business. At all events, my prospects are not bad, and God will help me further. I have hired a piano again, though I have not much time for music, but my Oxford friends expect it, for they all like to listen, though few of them play.’

Of these early days and first lectures, Professor Cowell

(now Professor of Sanskrit at Cambridge) writes, December 24, 1900 :—

‘MY DEAR MRS. MAX MÜLLER,—It has occurred to me that I could not better illustrate Max Müller’s influence on his contemporaries than by briefly describing his influence on my own career.

‘I went up to Oxford as a married undergraduate in January, 1851. I had previously studied the classical Sanskrit poetry by myself, and I eagerly embraced the opportunity of reading with the Boden Professor. I used to go to his lodgings at the end of the High Street. It was on one of these afternoons that the Professor suddenly stopped our reading and said, “Dr. Max Müller is going to deliver his first lecture on Comparative Philology at two o’clock to-day; let us walk up to the Taylor Buildings and hear it.” The lecture was a written one, and was delivered to a large and attentive audience, and to most of those present, as well as myself, it was an introduction to the new world of Comparative Philology. It was the first of a series of such lectures, all of which I carefully attended. After the lecture, Professor Wilson introduced me to the lecturer, who kindly invited me to take tea with him that evening. We soon became fast friends, and I found in him the very guide and counsellor that I needed. He was especially suited to inspire a younger student with enthusiasm. He soon discovered that I was fairly acquainted with the classical Sanskrit and its literature, but knew nothing of the grammarians, the commentators, or the Rig-veda; and he read with me some of the first volume, then just published, of his great edition of the Rig-veda.

‘During the six years of my life at Oxford, Max Müller was my constant guide in my Sanskrit studies; he taught me to read Sâyana’s Commentary and some of the philosophical works, but, above all, he imbued me with his own enthusiasm for Indian literature and his deep sympathy with the Hindu mind. When I went out to Calcutta in 1856 I tried to carry out many of his suggestions, and devoted my spare time to further studies on the lines which he had first pointed out to me; and my Brâhman pandits only carried on the work which he had commenced for me in Oxford.’

Mr. Tuckwell may again be quoted :—‘I remember that Sir Thomas (then Mr.) Acland and I went together to Max Müller’s opening lecture. Acland was disturbed, fidgeted, bit his nails—“It frightens one,” he said. . . . I attended Müller’s stimulating philological lectures, learning from his lips the novel doctrine of the Aryan migrations, and the rationale of Greek myths; the charm of his delivery heightened by a few Germanisms of pronunciation and terminology.' Mr. Story-Maskelyne writes of these early Oxford days:—

BASSET DOWN HOUSE, SWINDON, October 13, 1901.

'DEAR MRS. MAX MÜLLER,—In reply to your letter, I regret to tell you that I cannot put my hand on letters from Max. My acquaintance with him began almost immediately after my being called to Oxford to take the duties of one of the Chairs held by Dr. Buckland, at the time when his genial and energetic nature was clouded by mental failure. Max was summoned—I think in the same term as myself, in 1851—to fulfil the duties of the Chair of another Professor under a similar eclipse. My impression is that I first made his acquaintance at the house of Donkin, the Professor of Astronomy, a fine mathematician and scholar as well as musician; one, indeed, like Henry Smith, of those men of refined and beautiful nature that one meets only occasionally in the world, and who leave it too soon. There Max was at home. In that congenial atmosphere there also moved Carus, a physiologist and friend of Max. Often would he, a master of the violin, accompany Max, under whose hands the piano became a poem in music. I am no musician, but even to-day I can remember with enjoyment the dual music that Max and Carus used to produce; occasionally, too, in my own queer little rooms under the Ashmolean, where I retained a piano that would suggest this use of it.

'You know that Max and I were nearly of the same age, and I am now seventy-eight, with a memory, alas! no longer quick and vivid. The figure of Max is, however, never dimmed in my vision. Though near my age, I never looked on him as less than ten years older than myself, in wisdom, tact, experience of life, and knowledge of men. "Klug" was the term Bunsen applied to him, and though he seems from the beginning to have lived with the Olympians, whether intellectual or social, it was they who sought him rather, I think, than he who climbed into their company.

'He lived in those days in a little lodging in a terrace in the Banbury Road, with a little companion, Belle his dog. Many and many were the walks—Oxonice, constitutionals—which we three had together in those years, 1851–7, and many of the interests of my later life had their germs planted then.

'Johnson, the Radcliffe Observer, was one of his Oxford friends. Frank Palgrave, Froude (of course), Morier were among the contemporaries outside of Oxford whom one met with him.

'Well do I remember his lectures. I think his first course<sup>1</sup> was on the Nibelungen-Lied. They were given in the Taylor Building, and were remarkable in various ways. It was a new star in the Oxford firmament. Probably not half a dozen of his audience knew anything of the old epic or its history. Before the best of the men from the Common Rooms—a considerable gathering—stood the young German Professor, and the weird old tale, or redaction of old tales, he illuminated with side-lights from sagas and myths gathered from the folk-lore of Iceland and of Gamle Norge; and through the whole ran the sad refrain so often recurring in the rugged music of the poem. But for pure, terse English and luminous exposition I do not think any Oxford man—unless it was Church of Oriel (afterwards Dean of St. Paul's)—could have given such a course of lectures. It was a new light, a new idea of literature and lecture, that Max imported into the grey old walls of beautiful Oxford. Mr. Philip Pusey rode over all the way from his place near Faringdon with his boy-son to hear each lecture, an early homage to the rising fame of the redactor of the Rig-veda. I had to sit at the back of the audience, and to offer faithful criticism on idiomatic expression and on pronunciation. I had little to offer, though of course now and then Max's fine English touched an inexact note, more particularly in the latter difficulty. He received such criticisms with great kindness. But, in truth, the lectures were too interesting to allow of one's thinking of such very slight and by no means unpicturesque foils to them. Natural Science was not in high vogue then at Oxford, but the leaves on the trees were beginning to stir, so that when Max proclaimed his thesis that Comparative Philology and the historical development of language should rank with the Natural Sciences, there was a little rustle of scepticism, though in fact he was anticipating the assertion of evolution being the key to Natural Science.

<sup>1</sup> It was his second course.

'I should be tiring you—perhaps I may say any one but you—were I to continue reeling off these phonographs of a somewhat clouded memory. But these shadows of the past, as they seem to grow into images and visions, call for my pen to record them as they flit across my memory.

Yours very truly,

'N. STORY-MASKELYNE.'

Max Müller's first course was on 'The History of Modern Languages,' in the Lent Term of 1851; his second on 'The Home of the Nibelungen'; and the third, in the Autumn Term, on 'The Origin of the Romance Languages.' The Science of Comparative Philology was then little known in England, and these lectures of the young foreigner struck a new, almost strange note, amid the classical studies of the old University, opening out a dim vista of life far older than the times of the Greeks and Romans, and of a language more perfect than Hebrew, and with which, as the elder sister of the Teutonic tongues, Englishmen ought to become better acquainted.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, March 13, 1851.

‘My lectures are nearly at an end, and did very well. I had an audience of from fifty to seventy people, mostly Professors and tutors, and a number of ladies. I must prepare my course for next term, and I get no rest and the Veda gets on very slowly, and so my finances suffer. I have not yet decided whether I shall stay here. My friends persuade me to do so, but it has its difficulties and disagreeables, as no foreigner can have the position an Englishman would have. I shall quietly wait what comes, and if they make me a good offer take it; at all events, for the near future.’

The next day Max Müller writes to Bunsen :—

Translation.

March 14, 1851.

‘For some days I have been intending to write to you, to thank you warmly for your friendly recommendation of my article to Empson. I should like, as there is so much time, that Empson should return me the MS. to look through again, before it is printed. During my lectures some jokes have occurred to me, which appear to amuse John Bull, and which I should like to add. The lectures are nearly over; to-day is the last but one. They went off better than I expected. Many people took real interest in them.’

The same day Bunsen writes :—

Translation.

LONDON.

‘It is such a delight to be able at last to write to you, to tell you that few events this year have given me such great pleasure as your noble success in Oxford. The English have shown how gladly they will listen to something good and new, if any one will lay it before them in their own halls. Morier has faithfully reported everything, and my whole family sympathize in your triumph, as if it concerned ourselves.’

Through this vacation, Max Müller stayed quietly in Oxford to prepare his next lectures, and seems to have been far from well, suffering, as usual, from the Oxford climate. He writes to Dr. Pauli:—

Translation.

April, 1851.

‘I have long wanted to write to you, but I have been so unwell the whole time, that I could not manage it. Cold, cough, headache, and toothache are a quartette that makes one quite miserable; now I only have the solo of toothache, but that is enough to spoil life. I would willingly have gone to London, but I cannot now. I have lectures to write, &c. Have you got any treatise on the Nibelungen you can lend me?’

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

April, 1851.

‘After the end of next term I hope to go to London, and there are many things that I wish to tell you, and consult about with you.

‘I shall lecture this term on the Nibelungen, chiefly with reference to the Homeric question. For the relation of the poetical order to the legendary material I take Firdusi; for the fact of preservation in the memory, the Mahābhārata; for the loss and historizing of the legend, Niebuhr’s Rome; for the changing and misunderstanding of epic songs, the Nibelungen compared with the Edda. The whole is to be a continuation of comparative philology, brought about by the transition into the Epos, in its three grades of legends of Gods, Heroes, and Men.’

Yet, notwithstanding his hard work, Max Müller could write to Dr. Pauli:—

Translation.

May 9.

‘In spite of wind and weather we are very jolly, and play Beethoven trios, duets, and solos every evening, and two little singing birds from London have settled here, and so we Mendelssohn a good deal.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

June 1.

‘I am glad my lectures will soon be over, and that I shall then return to my regular work. I have again had a good audience, and people have shown great interest. How it will be later I do not know, and trouble myself but little about it. If the Professorship were definitely offered me, I would take it for five years. It is a pleasant position, and independent, and affairs in Germany are such, that I don’t desire any Government appointment. But I shall not carry on the lectures provisionally, as they hinder me so much from my other work, and I can earn much more money by the Veda. If I could only send you something from time to time, that you might make your life a more comfortable one, but I have myself to be so very careful to manage to live here in Oxford, that I don't think I can take a journey in the vacation. I shall go to London when term is over, as Bunsen has invited me to his house, but I shall probably stay with Morier, where one feels freer. I have been up for the day to see the Exhibition, but it is quite impossible to give you the least idea of the impression this house of glass makes on one. I had lately a visit from the young Prince of Prussia<sup>1</sup>, who came to Oxford, and I had to take him about the whole day. He seems to me very clever, very natural, has the greatest admiration for England, and is evidently in good hands. I do not envy him his future; he will have a difficult life, however happy and free from care it may now appear as he looks on. In the evening we dined together, and I accompanied him to the railway, where he took leave of me in the most hearty manner.'

In July Max Müller went to London to Morier, and tells his mother that he has been asked to continue his lectures with a higher salary as Deputy Professor, and that he has accepted. His health at this time was better, and his headaches less frequent, owing to a plan of treatment his doctor had adopted, so that he could work on with less interruptions. 'How much time would have been saved had I known of this medicine sooner!' He tried to persuade his mother to visit England this year to see the Exhibition, and assured her, if she would do so, he would be able in a year's time to repay her her expenses, though just at the moment he had no spare money.

From London Max Müller returned to Oxford, and then went to Wales to the Froudes', and from there writes to his mother:—

Translation.

PLAS GWYNANT, August 21.

'I am staying with a friend whom I knew earlier in Oxford, Mr. Froude, a very gifted writer. He has written some novels which have made a great sensation in England. He has been married nearly two years; his wife is very highly educated and agreeable, and here they live among the mountains, and he enjoys the dolce far niente, fishing, shooting, riding, and writing. The situation of the house is perfect. . . . I shall stay here a fortnight. The only thing I miss is my beautiful piano, which I bought in London. It is a grand square by Collard, and by Neukomm's help, who is a great musician, I got it for £50. It is in splendid tone, but is so large it could not be got up the staircase, but with great difficulty was hoisted through the window. You may now address me as Professor if you like, but not Professor and Doctor together.'

<sup>1</sup> The Emperor Frederick.

He says later: 'The time in Wales was delightful, and I was idle, which set me up.'

TO DR. PAULI.

Translation.

OXFORD, September, 1851.

'A few days ago I found at the Bodleian the copy of Alfred<sup>1</sup> you sent there for me. My best thanks for it. I have only read a little of it, which interested me very much, especially the critique on Asser's Gesta. Do you really think that Asser wrote for his countrymen? If so, they must have been different fellows to the present Welsh, who really are more like Wallachians. I made acquaintance with them at Froude's, where they broke into the house at night, and we had to sleep with loaded pistols to make our lives safe. But notwithstanding I enjoyed myself there thoroughly. I bathed every morning in the waterfall, and all day long we walked, and fished, and shot. Snowdon is beautiful, and the lakes beyond description. When I have finished Alfred I shall send it to Froude, who will be delighted with it. He has, as you know, written the life of St. Neot in the Lives of the Saints, and does not trust Asser. He may be able to write a readable review on it. He is very happy with his wife and baby, and I would gladly have stayed longer, but it was so beautiful I could do no work. So here I am again in Oxford, busy with the Veda and lectures.'

On returning to Oxford he put the last touches to his review of Bopp's Comparative Grammar, which appeared in the October number of the Edinburgh. It excited considerable interest at the time, and many were the guesses made at the authorship, though probably there are not many now alive who remember reading it. Bunsen and Stanley and other valued friends wrote to congratulate. Bunsen says: 'Early this morning I read it through at last, and joyfully and heartily utter my macte virtute. Your examples and particularly your notes will help and please the English reader. The introduction is as excellent (ad hominem and yet dignified) as the end.' The end is perhaps one of the most melodious paragraphs that Max Müller ever wrote. The article has never been reprinted. It ends thus:—

<sup>1</sup> Life of Alfred, 1851.

‘And now that generations after generations have passed away, with their languages—adoring and worshipping the name of God—preaching and dying in the name of God—thinking and meditating on the name of God—there the old word stands still, breathing to us the pure air of the dawn of humanity, carrying with it all the thoughts and sighs, the doubts and tears, of our bygone brethren, and still rising up to heaven with the same sound from the basilicas of Rome and the temples of Benares, as if embracing by its simple spell millions and millions of hearts in their longing desire to give utterance to the unutterable, to express the inexpressible.’

In October Max Müller received a visit from Dr. Bernays, the eminent philologist, later Professor at Bonn, ‘a very capable and delightful man,’ and a very close friendship, as we shall see later from their constant correspondence, sprang up between the devout Jew and the young Professor.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, November 16.

‘MY DEAR MOTHER,—I am well accustomed to decipher MSS., but still it is not a little labour to read your letters, especially when, like the last, they are written with more water than ink. If I could send you a bottle of good English ink, I would gladly do so. But I think if you look about in Dresden, you will be able to get some decent material for about a penny.

‘I am not worrying my head with plans for the future, but let it go as it best may. I have not at all made up my mind to spend the rest of my life in Oxford, though I quite see it would be folly to turn away from the prospects opening for me here. But one misses a good deal here that one has in Germany, especially pleasant intercourse with learned men: for there is little talk here of literary work. If all is quiet, I thought of going in the vacation not only to Germany but to Italy—but this will be only if I continue to lecture in Oxford. If I do so, I must learn to talk Italian, and this one can only do in the country. But these plans are all vague—and who knows what may happen first? . . . We stand every moment in God’s hands, and He knows best what is for our real welfare.

‘Trust in God is the only happiness on earth: without that our whole life is but anxiety and care. . . . I send you £5 to buy Christmas presents for yourself and the Krugs.’

On December 4 Max Müller was made honorary M.A., and a member of Christ Church. He writes at once to tell his friend Dr. Pauli, and through him the Bunsens :

Translation.

December, 1851.

‘To-day I have been made member of a college, no less than Christ Church, where the Common Room is now the most agreeable. The old Dean performed the ceremony in the pleasantest way, and feels free from all scruples, because he has found a precedent in Graevius, who was made a member of Christ Church some hundreds of years ago. Without that he would hardly have given his consent! Happy old England! . . . I can hardly help laughing when the black gown flaps about my legs. But one gets accustomed to everything, and with each year one is older and more middle-aged—that is sad—but one cannot escape it here in Oxford.’

Of Max Müller’s associates in Christ Church Common Room in the early fifties very few are left. Mr. Prout recalls Max’s freshness and originality, which made him a very popular member of Common Room, and the genuine regret of the other members when the time came for him to leave, on his election as a Fellow of All Souls. And Dean Kitchin remembers how much he enlivened the party, and how he was ‘always brimming over with good things.’ The Dean had, however, known him earlier in his career in Oxford, and says : ‘Max Müller left on me an enduring picture of himself—the young eager student, with his handsome face and sympathetic manner and bright, expressive eyes. He was then seeing his Veda through the Press. I remember how I with my German sympathies was attracted by his clever piano-forte playing—the Sanskrit I took for granted.’

CHAPTER VIII

1852-1853

Member of Bavarian Academy. Summer in Germany. The Butlers. Arrival and baptism of Dr. Aufrecht. Essay on Turanian Languages for Bunsen. Visit to Scotland. First meeting with future wife. Missionary Alphabet.

ON February 2, 1852, Max Müller writes to his mother that he has just had the most agreeable surprise, having been elected a member of the Royal Bavarian Academy at the same time as Bunsen and Macaulay. Max had only just completed his twenty-eighth year, and to be elected with two such confrères, men whose names had been before the world when he was a mere student, was no slight compliment. He writes to Dr. Pauli:—

Translation.

OXFORD, 1852.

‘DEAR PAULI,—The Diploma from Munich has arrived safely; as I knew nothing about it, I was very much surprised. It must have been Bunsen’s recommendation: I should like to know this that I may thank him. The news of Eliot Warburton’s death touched me deeply, as we had seen him so lately, and well and happy.

His lectures during the first two terms of the year were on the ‘History of German Literature in the Seventeenth Century,’ and were well attended. These early lectures and his influence over his audience were described many years later by one of his hearers:—

‘There has seldom been any one less like the typical German workman than Professor Max Müller. He is a marvellous example of how a foreigner may use the English tongue with more fluency and elegance than even the ordinary cultivated native; and how a man trained in other than English conditions may be all the better qualified to stimulate and instruct the English mind when he speaks its own familiar language. It is now more than half a century since he began to act as a fertilizing agency in what was then the rather arid field of English scholarship. His quick and sensitive intellect, so easily touched, so rapidly assimilative, had been moved on the philological side by men like Burnouf, on the philosophical by Schelling, and on the religious by Bunsen. And this combination of masters saved him from falling into the detached specialism which has been the note of so many German workmen, and supplied the sort of co-ordinating idealism which has been the mark of all his work. He had thus the instincts and training of the scholar, and also, in a rarer degree, the genius of the popular expositor. The quick and sensitive and assimilative qualities of his mind made him, especially in the earlier part of his career, all the more stimulative a teacher. He was a kind of prophet of the dawn, while as yet it was dark—i. e. he interpreted to the slow-paced English mind things especially touching language and religion which had never entered into its heart to conceive, but which had been exercising the higher scholarship and the newer philosophy of both Germany and France.'

One of the great pleasures of this year was the return of his old friend Mr. George Butler with his brilliant young wife to live in Oxford. Mrs. Butler was a very good musician, and the possessor of a fine grand pianoforte, and for the next five years, till the Butlers left Oxford, Max Müller was on the most intimate terms with them. Mrs. Butler recalls his gaiety, his readiness of repartee, his brilliant powers of conversation, his fresh, almost boyish enjoyment of everything: whilst the common bond of music drew them much together. Numerous were the excursions and picnics in which Max Müller took part with his friends, whose house was constantly full of young guests, sisters or other relatives of the Butlers. With the exception of Professor Donkin's family, and the Observer Manuel Johnson, there was no house in those days where Max felt so completely at home, or was so welcomed and liked by all the inmates.

Some years later Mrs. Méricoffre, Mrs. Butler's sister, wrote:—

'I recall one afternoon, a few days before the old Duke of Wellington's funeral, when we hunted Max Müller out of his Sanskrit den, and made him take a long walk with us. He bought some fresh eggs at a farm-house, and put them in the tail pockets of his coat. On returning we climbed some fences, and we sat upon some stiles, and on reaching home Müller found an extensive omelet in his pocket.'

But agreeable and bright as his life was at this time, which he fully recognized, the old longing for Germany constantly breaks out. 'I long so often to be back in Germany,' he writes to his mother, 'that if any sort of favourable prospect offered, I would willingly exchange my pleasant life in Oxford for a simple German ménage.'

TO F. PALGRAVE, ESQ.

9, PARK PLACE, March 21, 1852.

'I was at your gate on Saturday afternoon as I had written to you the day before. I was very sorry to have missed you, and still more when I heard the sad reason<sup>1</sup> which kept you at home. It is the hardest trial which we have to go through, I think—at least there is nothing which I dread so much. I feel for you and with you more than I can say; however, nothing strengthens our hope of meeting again as much as the loss of those we love. Oxford has been very quiet, and I have been hard at work on the Veda as my lectures did not give me much trouble. The English book has been stopped, but it will be finished before the Long. In summer I hope to go to Germany, but I have a good deal to do before I go. . . . Jowett is hard at work, and has finished the Romans. Stanley lives with Conington, and writes reports in the tower at University. Whenever you are back at Kneller Hall, I hope to pay you a visit, unless you prefer to come to Oxford.'

Max allowed himself only a day or two of holiday in the Easter Vacation. 'I feel that every day I waste now, I lose a day of my summer holiday,' and as his headaches were less frequent and also less severe when he did have them, he could work on vigorously. He tells his mother that he means to be thoroughly idle in Germany and amuse himself. He will not visit either Leipzig or Berlin. He writes:—

Translation.

April 18, 1852.

'I am nowhere so happy as in Dessau. You will laugh at this, but had you been living for six or seven years among strangers you would understand how delightful it is to see well-known faces and well-known streets and houses round one. If I had independent means, I would live in Dessau, and by choice in my grandfather's house with the garden, where I know every tree. If we stay some time there in the vacation, I had rather not stay the whole time with my uncle. Perhaps we could take some rooms, or live in the hotel?'

<sup>1</sup> His mother's dangerous illness.

In June he writes like a schoolboy expecting his holidays : 'the joy of meeting makes up for the long separation, and, as old Goethe says, it is not necessary to be always together to remain united.' He had to take his part in the Grand Commemoration of that year, and a few pages of Veda to finish, and then he was free. On June 14 he writes to his mother :—

Translation.

'You will have heard the sad news of Burnouf's death. In him I have lost a good friend, and the loss to literature is irreparable. Many of his books remain unfinished, and as there is no good Sanskrit scholar in Paris, I have half promised his friends to go there to advise with them about his library and MSS. It may be this will only be later, when the Will is known. He leaves a widow and four daughters. But I should only have to spend a day or two there, and should be glad if it could be on my return journey.'

Early in July, Max Müller left England, joined his mother at Dresden, where his friend Palgrave met him for a time but was summoned back to England by his mother's increased illness, and after a visit to his sister at Chemnitz took his mother to Carlsbad, and from there he made an excursion to Munich and the beautiful scenery of the Salzkammergut. From Munich, after many hours in the Pinakothek, he writes to his mother :—

Translation.

'I am more than ever convinced that the Italian, Spanish, and French schools together are not so fine, and true, and strengthening, as the old German and Dutch schools. J. van Eyck, Hans Hemling, Rembrandt, Dürer, even Holbein and Cranach, were very fine. The Raphaels, Andrea del Sarto, Palma Vecchio, Perugino, . . . Leonardo, &c., are also wonderful, but they make so much parade of their art, and they are more bent on showing how beautifully they can paint, whilst the Germans just paint away because their heart is in it.'

He had plenty of time to visit all the beauties of Munich, as he was detained there several days through some difficulty about his passport for Austria, as he intended to visit the Tyrol. It must have been during this visit to the Tyrol that he found himself in great danger. After a long lonely day on foot he arrived late at a most forbidding-looking little inn, but it was too late to go further. The people of the inn were rude and evil-looking, and he was thankful to be able to barricade his door with a heavy piece of furniture. The door was twice attempted in the night. In the morning he found that the only guide to be had over a lonely road was a surly-looking man, but he made the guide keep in front of him the whole way, and was himself armed with a strong walking-stick. He always said that had he shown the least fear the man would have attacked him. It must be remembered that in 1852 the Tyrol was less explored and known than it is now.

On rejoining his mother they spent some happy weeks together, and Max returned to Oxford by Leipzig and Berlin, visiting many old friends. He tells his mother on his arrival in Oxford :—

Translation.

‘One cannot always have such a happy time as I spent this summer. I cannot tell you how comfortable I was this time at home, but I will not complain, but only hope that it will be so again another time, if God wills. We owe to Him all the good that befalls us, and what He orders is best. Take care of yourself, and don’t be unhappy, all goes with us so much better than we deserve, and than with many others. The recollection of all the happiness is a comfort too, and never has the recollection of our time together been so bright and undisturbed as this time. You were so good to me, my dear mother. I would willingly live in Dresden, but as that cannot be, you must come to Oxford when the weather is fine.’

TO F. PALGRAVE, ESQ.

9, PARK PLACE, October 22, 1852.

‘I need not tell you how I felt your loss. I should like to shake your hand—but these losses must be borne in silence. Do come to Oxford if you can, and let us talk about our little expedition to Dresden. I had such a pleasant journey afterwards to Carlsbad, the Tyrol, Salzburg, Munich—how I wished you had been with me. As to art, Munich beats everything, and the people are so much nicer, much more genial than at Berlin. Their beer is excellent, and it makes them good-natured. And such pictures, particularly from the German school . . . you must go there next year, I am sure you will be delighted. That old king was after all a great genius, whatever Lola may say of him, and however bad his poems and his prose may be. Walrond is going away; Conybeare going to be married; Morier going to Australia: so one begins to feel alone, and that is bad, and the only thing to be done is to work. Please remember me kindly to Temple.’

His lectures this term were on the 'Classification of Languages,' but he had hardly began them before he was again laid up from Oxford fogs and damp.

November, 1852.

'DEAR MRS. BUTLER,—It is very kind of you to cheer me up from time to time with kind inquiries, good admonitions, dear messages, and other how-do-you-do varieties. I wish I could return thanks myself, but in this weather the doctor tells me I must not go out for a week. I am quite resigned to my fate, and begin to understand what it means that you are nowhere freer than in prison. I read and write, and get a good deal of work done, which has been weighing heavily on my conscience for some time. I need not go out and eat many dinners, or make many calls. I can smoke without fear of detection. I get my friends one by one to see me and talk to me, which is so much better than if you have them all at once. I need not deliver lectures; altogether I am as happy as mortal man can be with November fogs and earthquakes all around him, not to mention gout, rheumatism, sore throats, and divers kinds of diseases to plague him. . . . Thomson asks me to write him an article on Indian Logic for the third edition of his Laws of Thought, which I am doing just now;—and here I was interrupted by Miss Grey's visit, and could not even go downstairs to speak to her, for I am so thoroughly Germanized in appearance that I must not show myself to any lady, and here a visit, so I must give it up for to-day, and remain yours truly, M. M.'

This attack of illness determined him to follow the advice Bunsen had long given him, and take an assistant for the more mechanical part of his Vedic work. Bunsen seems to have mentioned Dr. Aufrecht from Berlin to him. Max Müller entered into negotiations with Dr. Aufrecht, who arrived in Oxford in December. Early in that month Max writes to Bunsen:—

' . . . I expect Aufrecht daily. You have always advised me to seek help, and I could no longer get through my work alone, with the many interruptions caused by my health. Aufrecht is a very conscientious scholar, and as far as the rest goes that will all be right.'

Max Müller writes to his mother telling her of the new arrangement:—

Translation.

December 19.

'Dr. Aufrecht is a very clever man, a Sanskritist, &c. We work together, and he helps me at my Veda, for which I pay him enough to live here. We shall try the plan at first for six months, and I hope it will all go well. It is very pleasant for me to have some one with whom I can talk about literary things, and my time is so filled up that I am very glad to have some one to whom I can leave part of my work: but I must wait awhile to see how it works, and whether it brings me in as much as it costs. I must spend Christmas in Oxford, as I cannot well leave him alone. The weather is dreadful, and I have constant headaches, mostly from severe colds. Otherwise I have got quite accustomed again to the English way of living, and if I would often rather find myself in Germany, you know it is not my way to grumble. We must take life as God sends it, and it would be ungrateful did I not acknowledge the many comforts I have here, and only dwell on what I miss.'

Aufrecht lived in the same house with his employer.

The following letter alludes to the book known as Church's Essays and Reviews, a title that had not then become notorious:—

9, PARK PLACE, December 22, 1852.

'MY DEAR PALGRAVE,—I thought you would be sure to come to Oxford for the Exeter College election, else I should have written to you before this, and asked whether you would put your name to a testimonial which we intend to present to Church. You know he is going to leave Oxford, and take a small living to marry. Some of his friends are going to ask him to allow them to print a selection of his articles—not theological—and to make him a present of the whole edition. We have already a large subscription, about forty names. The subscription will be £3. Please tell me whether you wish your name to be added. Acland, Donkin, Butler, Marriott, &c., take great interest in the matter, but until the whole expense is secured by subscription, it must not be talked about. If you can get some of your friends to join, please write to them. Grant and Sellar have been written to, and have sent their subscriptions. You know probably that Sewell is going to leave Oxford. Why do you never write? Have you heard from Froude? He is staying at his father's, and very happy.'

The early part of this Christmas Vacation was spent by Max Müller in Oxford, in order to initiate his secretary Aufrecht in the work he had to do. The great floods of 1852 had left the place in a very unhealthy state, and before his lectures began again his friends the George Butlers, who were spending the vacation with their father Dean Butler at Dover, asked him to pay them a visit there. On his return he writes:—

TO MRS. BUTLER.

9, PARK PLACE, January, 1853.

‘I have not had a quiet minute since I came back; there was a friend from Germany waiting to be lionized all over Oxford: then all sorts of people who came to vote, and at the same time to walk and talk: then Aufrecht with lots of questions: then dinner-parties again: and letters to answer, and proofs to correct. I really wish I could sport my oak like an undergraduate, and have done with the world altogether, at least for an hour or two, that I might be able to tell you how much I enjoyed my trip to Dover, and how happy I felt among people who seemed all to be so very happy themselves. Please to translate into as good English as possible my best thanks to the Dean and Mrs. Butler. I am glad to hear that you have had a few fine days; the weather is getting better at Oxford also. As to the floods, they will not be gone before March, but the late storms have made the atmosphere quite healthy again. I do not know anything about the election; in fact, I have not seen a paper since I came back. Belle is in the most flourishing condition, so Oxford cannot be such an unhealthy place after all.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, January 30, 1853.

‘... My lectures begin next week, and give me a good deal of work; and then I was away for a week at Dover. Dover was beautiful, especially in the storms. The waves almost beat on my windows. From the land a stormy sea looks grand. I would willingly have stayed on, but I could not leave my house companion longer alone. He is a capable man, but a little difficult to get on with. At present he takes up a good deal of my time, as I must tell and explain everything to him; but I think later he will be an advantage. I must give more time to my lectures, for England expects every man to do his duty. I do not worry about money, and would rather live more economically than let my work suffer. . . . I often feel now how much time I lost from my work during my long holiday last year—that must not happen again, life is not long enough for such pauses—and yet when I am with you I always think, “You can make up the time afterwards in your work; enjoy the time together as long as you can.” . . . We have had a great business here with the Parliamentary election. Gladstone, who was elected, and is now Chancellor of the Exchequer, was here on a visit a few days ago. I have seen and talked with him several times; he is an interesting man, and a very good speaker.’

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

*Translation.*9, PARK PLACE, February 2, 1853.

'I get on better with Aufrecht, but not so very well yet. He decidedly desires to be baptized, but he does not feel inclined to talk to others on this point or anything connected with it.

'It is possible that when he has once taken this step he may get to feel more inner satisfaction and confidence in friends, which is prevented now by morbid impressions and imaginations. I am convinced he is a true and honest soul, but he is unsympathetic. His knowledge is thoroughly sound and comprehensive. He works well, and he seems to like his position, as he desires to stay in England. But there can be no question about working together, for as soon as one presses him a little hard he draws his head into his shell like a tortoise, and one must then leave him alone. But I still hope that in time things will take a better shape, as they are already far better than they were at first.'

The Deputy Professor was to lecture this term on 'Declension,' and so popular were his lectures, that he had a large proportion of ladies among his audience, a greater proportion than was convenient in a small lecture-room, and on being asked by a rather pompous Don what the title of his lectures meant exactly, he was ungallant enough to reply, 'I wish it might mean that I decline ladies!' This must have got abroad, to judge from the next letter to Bunsen:

*Translation.*9, PARK PLACE, February 19, 1853?

'... I am very well now and very happy. Aufrecht begins to "thaw." My time is almost entirely taken up with my lectures, which for the first time give me great pleasure. I have fifty hearers, all undergraduates, and many of them capable and industrious men. I write nothing, but speak extempore to them, and I feel that I can be really useful to them. My former hearers were mostly curious and suspicious Dons, and I got tired of writing rhetorical essays to be read to them. Now everything gets into much better shape, and I only hope that next term I may receive my definite appointment. I have now got to the old Latin inscriptions, Columna Rostrata, &c., and it is incredible how little one can rely upon copies; in almost every edition you find inaccuracies and variations. If only somebody would at last give exact facsimiles.'

A day or two later he writes again to Bunsen, in answer to a letter advising him to give a course of lectures on Greek Literature:—

Translation.

'I shall have finished my lectures in about a fortnight. The holidays will only last three weeks, then lectures begin again. I dare hardly venture to undertake a course on Greek literature, for my subject must always be more or less in connexion with modern languages. This is possible with titles like "declension," "conjugation," &c., including a few words about modern formations, and then concentrating on Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit. But "history of Greek literature" would hardly fit into anything. I shall hope to continue next term my lectures on Declension, and to prepare lectures on Italian Ethnology. One has to read up what is fit for the examination; and the population of Italy according to Livy and Niebuhr belongs to the standing questions. I am getting on better and better with Aufrecht, and I hope in time we shall get on capitally.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, March 5, 1853.

'The uncertain weather we are having in Oxford is very unhealthy. And yet I feel better than I have felt for a long time, and my work gets on well. I do not know what the papers have been saying again about me. My position has not as yet changed in the least, but I hope to get my full salary in October. The uncertainty is unpleasant, but I shall not starve, and everything else can be borne! My assistant costs a good deal, but that will in time be repaid, and his company, at least for literary discussion, is very useful. Of course there are many difficulties, but in time they will be set right. I correspond pretty regularly with Bunsen; he writes one book after another, but writes too much and too quickly. The events in Milan are terrible. But how can the Austrians imagine that England will interfere? That England will never give up a political refugee is well understood. England has always been a refuge for dethroned kings and popular leaders, and the English would rather go to war than give up their right.'

In accordance with Dr. Aufrecht's own wishes about his baptism, Bunsen suggested that his eldest son, the Rev. Henry Bunsen, Rector of Lilleshall, should receive him, and perform the ceremony in his own parish church. This scheme was carried out. On his return Max Müller writes:—

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, April 3, 1853.

'YOUR EXCELLENCY,—We have passed the Easter holidays most agreeably at Lilleshall, and I, as well as Aufrecht, am most grateful to you for the great help you have given us in this somewhat difficult matter. Nowhere could the act have been performed so simply, so solemnly, and so undisturbedly as by your son at Lilleshall. The friendly welcome we received has not missed its impression upon Aufrecht, and I hope that in future matters will improve with him more and more . . .’

To his mother he writes :—

Translation.

April.

‘I would gladly go with you to Carlsbad, but after careful consideration I see that it is impossible for me to leave my work this year for the whole summer. I have begun several things which have been on my conscience for several years, and I owe it to myself to finish them ; and this I can only do here in England, and in the Long Vacation. And now I am busy with my lectures, and the decision as to my full salary occupies my time too. I have indeed a fair prospect that there will be no opposition ; but of course there is a prejudice against a foreigner, and I must do my best to keep all straight.’

On May 12 Bunsen wrote to urge Max Müller to join him at St. Leonards, but the Tylorian Professorship was vacant, and it was necessary to be on the spot.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, May 15, 1853.

‘The business is more complicated than I expected, and the steering more difficult the nearer one approaches the harbour. I am prepared for disappointment, but do not give up hope. The new difficulties arise from the fact that the Curators are intending to raise the salary considerably : this would be delightful, if I already had the appointment, but now it brings other interests into play, and entices others to stand as candidates. But still my prospects are good, and my opponents have but one card to play, that they are Englishmen, I not. In Oxford the tables won’t dance. I have wasted some hours in trying my hand at it, but the whole thing seems perfectly useless, especially as it is purely mechanical.

‘Aufrecht is going on all right—he does not wish to return to Germany.’

Bunsen wrote cheerily in reply, and says he had written to his ‘brotherly friend Pusey’ (the squire) to help in the canvass. ‘I know few men so able to give good advice ; besides, he is very much attached to you.’

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, May 28, 1853.

‘Contrary to my expectations, my affairs get more hopeless and involved. The Curators have at last had a meeting, and settled to postpone the election till after the Long Vacation. It is a hard trial of one's patience, especially as it is still uncertain whether my election may not after all be opposed, and I should then have lost four years' time and work. For three years I have laid all aside, and given my whole time to this office. I felt Spartam nactus es, hanc exorna, and if I had thus provided for my material wants for the rest of my life, I could well be satisfied, and should have had time and leisure to make up what I had lost. Now I really don't know what to do, and whether it is not best to return to Germany and finish up and publish what I have already done on the Veda. My friends advise me to stay on here, and they assure me Convocation would veto the election of any one else, if the Curators attempted it. For myself, I am almost indifferent. I shall probably have another year of this uncertainty, of which I have had enough in the past three years. However, such is the world, says John Bull, and tries to console himself. I am doing my best to follow his good advice.'

To this Bunsen replied :—

Translation.

May 30.

'It is a great trial of patience, but be patient, that is wise. One must never allow the toilsome labour of years of quiet reflection and of utmost exertion for the attainment of one's aim to be destroyed by an unpropitious event. It is most probably the best for you that the affair should not now be hurried through. Your claims are stronger every quarter, and will certainly become more so in the eyes of the English through good temper and patience under trying circumstances. I don't for a moment doubt that you will be elected. Germany would suit you now as little as it would suit me, and we both should not suit Germany. So patience, my dear friend, and with a good will.'

Early in May, Bunsen had written to Max Müller asking his help in the work then occupying all his leisure time and thoughts, 'The Philosophy of Universal History applied to Language and Religion,' being Volumes III and IV of Christianity and Mankind. Bunsen says :—

'In working over the historical part I put aside a chapter, "The Primitive Languages in India," but find out, just as I intended to make you the heros eponymus, that you only dealt in your lecture (before the British Association) with Bengali. . . . Could you not write a little article on this for my book? The original language in India must have been Turanian, not Semitic; but we are bound in honour to prove it.'

This invitation led to the pamphlet On the Turanian Languages, which is now out of print as a separate publication, but it forms, under the title, 'Last Results of the Turanian Researches,' the second half of the third volume of Bunsen's Christianity and Mankind, and though not published till 1854, owing to incessant delays in printing, was almost entirely written in 1853, and involved a constant correspondence with Bunsen through the rest of this year. It is many years since Max Müller gave up most of the views enunciated in his essay on the Turanian languages of India, views which were disproved as these languages were more fully known and studied. The concluding paragraph is perhaps worth quoting as applicable to all linguistic studies :—

'And now, if we gaze from our native shores over that vast ocean of human speech, with its waves rolling on from continent to continent, rising under the fresh breezes of the morning of history, and slowly heaving in our own more sultry atmosphere, with sails gliding over its surface, and many an oar ploughing through its surf, and the flags of all nations waving joyously together, with its rocks and wrecks, its storms and battles, yet reflecting serenely all that is beneath and above and around it; if we gaze and hearken to the strange sounds rushing past our ears in unbroken strains, it seems no longer a wild tumult, but we feel as if placed within some ancient cathedral, listening to a chorus of innumerable voices; and the more intensely we listen, the more all discords melt away into higher harmonies, till at last we hear but one majestic trichord, or a mighty unison, as at the end of a sacred symphony.

'Such visions will float through the study of the grammarian, and in the midst of toilsome researches his heart will suddenly beat, as he feels the conviction growing upon him, that men are brethren in the simplest sense of the word—the children of the same father—whatever their country, their colour, their language, and their faith.'

This was the year of Lord Derby's installation as Chancellor of the University, and Max Müller resolved to take refuge from all the gaities with Bunsen, who had long been pressing him to come to Carlton Terrace.

Besides the treatise on the Turanian or nomadic languages of India, Bunsen asked his help in tracing the relationship of the Vedic language with Zend, urging him to gather the results of his investigations into a separate chapter.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, July 3, 1853.

‘When you spoke to me in London about printing your work on Egypt, you told me that you expected my contribution in September. I therefore began at once to arrange and carry out the part with regard to the comparison of Egyptian and Aryan roots. The work requires great care, and if the essay is to be printed just as I write it, and under my responsibility, I cannot really promise its completion before September. The relation between Egyptian and Aryan is much like that which would exist between Sanskrit and French, did we not possess the connecting links. Mère, père, frère, and sœur, set against mātar, pātar, bhrātar, and svastar, show a systematic parallelism and a common origin. But if one had to compare Sanskrit āśru with larme, how could one prove their identity without the connecting links? Well, I will try, but it is quite impossible for me to solve the problem so quickly. Also in the matter of the relation of the Zend and Vedic peoples I will gladly formulate and prove the conclusions at which I have arrived, but I am a slow coach, and fear accidents in an express train. I hope, especially if there is no war, that you may have so many diplomatic occupations, that I may be ready before Egypt comes to be printed. I work every day at the Bodleian from nine till four, at the catalogue of the Sanskrit MSS.; then I am printing the preface to the second volume of the Veda, which is ready: then I am writing a treatise on the burning of bodies in the Veda, which is nearly ready (widows were not burnt). Then comes the essay for Lepsius on the Indian alphabet. Then the first volume of the Prolegomena must be printed before the end of the vacation; and lastly comes a course of lectures for next term. Where am I to find time without robbery? Professor Stenzler, of Breslau, is now here, a very capable man of the last generation, but who advances with modern progress, and has taken refuge from Alexander’s India in Vedic antiquity. He is Weber’s teacher.’

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

PARK PLACE, July 7, 1853.

‘I am sorry that I must again trouble you for an explanation as to the extent, as well as the sort of essay, on the original inhabitants of India and the Zend emigrants. You write that it is for your philosophical work. Is that “The Prophets” which I saw when I was in London, or is it an addition to the philosophical Aphorisms of Hippolytus? If it is for the Aphorisms, it ought to fill a couple of pages at most; but if it is for the great work on the “History of the World,” it must be much more diffuse. Or is it another book at which you are working ?'

It is not surprising that Max Müller was puzzled by the multiplicity of Bunsen's works, for nearly all of which he asked for help from his young friend. At this time he was expecting immediately three separate papers from Max Müller—on the Zend Avesta, the Rig-veda, and the Turanian languages of India, and later in the year Bunsen hoped for a linguistic chapter for his work on Egypt.

On July 11 Max Müller sent Bunsen the chapter on Persian Researches which will be found on p. 110 of Volume III, Christianity and Mankind, and which was reprinted in the original edition of Chips, Volume I, but was omitted in the last edition as 'not up to date.' On July 13 Bunsen writes :—

"What one desired in youth one obtains in old age." I felt this as I read your chapter yesterday. It is exactly what I first wished to know myself in order to tell it to my readers. You have done it after my own heart—only a little too briefly, for a concluding sentence on the connexion of the language of the Achaemenian Inscriptions with Zend is wanting.'

On July 30 he writes to his mother :—

Translation.

'Sunday is my best day for letter-writing. During the week work goes on from early till late, and my head is so full of Sanskrit I feel quite stupified. I am very glad I stayed here this summer. I had so many books to read and work through, for which I have no time in my lectures, and yet one must keep up with literature, or one would have to sing, like the Austrian militiamen, "Immer langsam voran." That it was hard to give up my plans for travelling, you can believe ; but one must remember the duties as well as the enjoyments of life, and so we will look forward to next year, when, please God, we shall be together. I am very well, and the harder I work the better I feel.'

At this time, when his old friend Carus was about to be married, he writes to his mother, who was always exhorting him to follow so good an example, 'I have not yet any plans of the sort. I think one has trouble enough in making one's own way through the world. If such a thing presents itself—well ; but I have no wish to take much trouble in looking about.'

Max Müller writes to Bunsen for his birthday :—

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, August 24.

‘First of all I wish you joy of this day with all my heart. May this day often return to you in the midst of all your dear ones, and in the full tide of all your work and labour. If to grow a year older means to have completed a new work, we can stand the growing older very well—it is not then a growing older; but it is growing, working, and getting young again, and our strength grows with every year that has been made use of, and with every work that has been completed. A fresh and powerful Senatus is after all the real strength of a country, the real support of the res publica in politics as well as in spirit. The Juventus is too much occupied with itself, and youth is often more hindering than useful when it comes to losing sight of oneself as much as possible. Allow me to continue to find courage and counsel with you, and have patience with a passenger who would like best to sit still in the carriage corner, and though not asleep would fain close his eyes till he has arrived at the last station.’

The sad tone of the last sentence is fully accounted for in the next letter to Bunsen, written the end of August :—

Translation.

August 28.

‘I feel what the English call knocked up, and I must get some fresh air before I can get to work again. You shall receive an essay on Vedic Antiquity from Wales, where I go to-morrow. It is possible that there may be, among the Persians, people or even races whose forefathers were Turanian or Semitic, but they acquired Persian just as the Normans acquired Saxon, and the Persian language has always remained the same. If it comes to classification of languages, it does not depend on who speaks the languages, just as little as a botanist troubles himself to know whether a potato has grown in Europe or America. I always use the term Aryan instead of Indo-European, Iranian only for Persian and Median. Both together I take as the South-Aryan branch, in contrast to all the rest of the Aryans who turned to the north-west. The collection of Hymns of the Rig-veda was completed towards 1000 B.C. That cannot of course be proved like  $2 + 2 = 4$ , but it is as sure as all our knowledge of these times can be. I enclose a sample translation which is to find a place in the Veda article: do you know of a poet who could Miltonize it a little more? He must add nothing however, for so far the translation is literal, as far as this is possible with the old thoughts.’

Max Müller went to the Froudes’ in Wales, but his enjoyment of this visit was spoilt by the weather. He tells his mother it rained day and night, and the mountains were too wet for any expeditions. On his return to Oxford he writes to Bunsen :—

Translation.

OXFORD, September 21, 1853.

‘I returned yesterday. My holiday was longer than I expected, and I hasten to send you the introduction to the Aryan chapter. I went first to Wales to Froude, who is very well, and hard at work. He has just published an article on John Knox in the Westminster. In the next number there will be an article on Job, and in the Edinburgh one on Spinoza. From Wales I went to Glasgow, where I stayed in Calder Park near the city with my friend Walrond. With him I made excursions to Oban and Ardtornish, then to Inverary, Loch Lomond, the Trossachs, and back to Glasgow, then to Edinburgh. The scenery was beautiful, and the fine air very enjoyable, and I hope my work will go on all the better for it.’

The expedition to Ardtornish, to stay with the parents of their old friend W. Sellar, nearly proved fatal to Max Müller and Theodore Walrond. They crossed from Oban, and a sudden storm coming up, the row-boat in which they were was in great danger. The crew, who only spoke Gaelic, to quiet their fears, imbibed so much whisky that they seemed incapable of managing the boat, and both Max and his friend had to lend a hand at the oars. But they were well repaid on their arrival by the beauty of the scenery round Ardtornish, and the next morning, the sea being calm, Max Müller, who was all his life a good swimmer, ran down to the beach for a dip. Putting his things, as he thought, in safety under some stones, he enjoyed his bath to the full. But he had not calculated on the force of the wind, and on emerging from the waves he found his clothes scattered far and wide, and some gone for ever. The stony beach was covered with a sort of prickly growth, probably a sea-holly, and the search was long and painful, and resulted in the recovery of only a few necessary garments. In this guise he had to make his way back to the house, the hall of which was used for breakfast, and where the family were already assembling. He used to say, in recounting the story, that the horror of the moment always came back upon him in full force.

On September 24 Bunsen writes :—

‘You have sent me the most beautiful thing you have yet written. I read your Veda essay yesterday, first to myself and then to my family circle, including Lady Raffles your great friend in petto, and we were all enchanted with both matter and form.'

The article of which Bunsen speaks will be found on p. 128 of Volume III, Christianity and Mankind, and was republished in Chips, Volume I, original edition, but like the Persian chapter was omitted in the last edition. In diction it well deserves the praise bestowed on it by Bunsen.

We constantly at this time, in his letters to Bunsen, find Max Müller complaining of the dilatoriness and carelessness of even the best London printers, as compared with the University Press at Oxford. In the latter years of his life he would consent to print nowhere else.

The lectures this term were on 'The Origin of the Romance Languages,' and he tells Bunsen his 'audience is larger than ever.' How he managed to get through all his work is a marvel, for besides his lectures, his Vedic work, the Turanian article for Bunsen, and a new work forced on him by his indefatigable friend, of which we shall hear presently, he was collecting testimonials for the Curators of the Taylor Institution, who had definitely fixed the election to the Professorship for the beginning of the January Term. Meantime they had been so satisfied with the result of the lectures, that, as he tells his mother, he is already receiving this quarter the full salary. The testimonials, the originals of which must ever be a precious treasure for his children, are from Humboldt, Bunsen, Bopp, Lepsius, Canon Jacobson (later Bishop of Chester), W. Thomson (later Archbishop of York), Mr. Jowett, Professors Wilson and Donkin. Mr. Jowett says of him, 'There are few persons in whom so much judgement is combined with so much imagination. It would be unnecessary to add, except to those who do not know him, that, during his stay at Oxford, he has been universally beloved and respected.' Mr. Donkin says, 'He can be elementary without being (in the bad sense) popular, and scientific without ceasing to be intelligible and interesting to beginners.'

And now we come to an event that was to alter and influence the whole remainder of Max Müller's life, though for several years to come the outer tenor of it may have seemed unchanged, and only one or two intimate friends knew the influence at work within him. On November 26 Max and his future wife met for the first time at her father's house. Mr. Froude, her uncle by marriage, had often spoken of his clever young German friend, and his brother-in-law asked him to bring Max Müller for a Saturday to Monday visit. Years after, he told her that as soon as he saw her, he felt, 'That is my fate.' The party assembled at Ray Lodge was a pleasant one, and he at once fascinated all present by his brilliant, lively conversation and exquisite music. He was very dark, with regular features, fine bright eyes, and a beautiful countenance full of animation, and it was difficult to reconcile his youthful appearance with his already great reputation. Two days later they met again, this time at Oxford, where the family from Ray Lodge went for a meeting of the leading Church choirs of the Diocese. Max Müller was their constant guide, and Magdalen, Merton, Christ Church, the Bodleian, &c., were visited in his company. He was asked to spend Christmas at Ray Lodge, but fealty to Bunsen and the work he was engaged in for him kept him at Oxford.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 9, 1853.

'I gladly accept your invitation for next Tuesday (to meet Kingsley), and I hope by then the first half of my essay will be printed. Aufrecht is very busy. A week ago he left this house and has taken a lodging for himself. He feels more independent, and I too feel more free. I wish one could find a secure place for him. He has been a year here, and I have never seen a man so totally changed, and certainly only for the better.'

It was almost at the close of the year that Bunsen asked Max Müller to help him in a scheme which was occupying his own mind a good deal, i.e. a Uniform Alphabet to be used by missionaries in reducing languages to writing for the first time. Lepsius had been occupied with this problem for some time, but his alphabet seemed too complicated for cheap printing. Max Müller at once took up the subject, and so hard did he work that his pamphlet, Proposals for a Uniform Missionary Alphabet, was ready to lay before the first conference held on the subject at Bunsen's house early in January, 1854. Max Müller's alphabet was very simple, employing italics for the modifications of the usual alphabet, whereas Lepsius's plans represented these modifications by signs, in some cases as many as three, over each letter. In one letter to Bunsen, Max Müller says, 'If we come to a common understanding with regard to the thirty-five definable consonants, and the twelve to fourteen vowels, let us thank God.' And again, 'If conferences are first to be held, I think it would be best I should not appear, but ask you to play the part of pleader. I have spoilt so many things through undue eagerness, that I prefer managing everything by writing. But I await your orders. If my proposals are not likely to be accepted, it is not worth the trouble of printing. If it is accepted, I am ready to publish them in golden letters on parchment! I promise Lepsius that if his alphabet is accepted, I will not print a word but in that, even if each letter has three accents.' So carefully and thoroughly did Max Müller go into the whole question, that he spent several days dissecting throats with Dr. Acland. 'I could give the whole alphabet anatomically drawn,' he says.

In the Life of Baron Bunsen we find some extracts from the diary of one of his daughters:—

'To breakfast came Sir C. Trevelyan, Sir J. Herschell, Mr. Arthur, Professor Owen, afterwards Mr. Venn and several missionaries and men of learning, to take part in the long-planned conference on the comparative merits of two systems of transcription for all alphabets. According to that of Max Müller, italics would take the place of all accents, lines, dots, used by Lepsius. The conference lasted uninterruptedly till half-past one o'clock.

'Bishop Thirlwall dined with us, and the conversation was animated between him and Lepsius (who arrived on the 27th) and Max Müller and my father. The alphabetical conferences take place every day.

'Lepsius has returned to Berlin. The last conference to-day leaves the matter undecided.'

And so it remained, after all the labour and time Bunsen and Max Müller had expended. The English missionary societies now mostly follow a system used by the Bible Society, but there is not entire unanimity.

CHAPTER IX

1854-1855

Professor of Modern Languages. Second volume of Rig-veda. Death of Burnouf. Crimean War. Languages of the Seat of War. Bunsen's resignation. Nehemiah Goreh. Visit to Germany. Froude. Kingsley. Macaulay. Visit to Malvern. Indian Civil Service Examinations. Paris. Dresden. M.A. by decree. Renan.

THE year opened darkly with rumours of war. Writing to Bunsen for the New Year, Max Müller says:—

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, January 1.

‘Above all, my best congratulations for the New Year: may it be a calm and blessed one for you and yours; and may it above all things teach the Russians and the Russophiles, that Europe will not be Cossacked nor Kossuthed, and that she would prefer to see the Crescent at Petersburg to the Russian Cross at Constantinople.

‘My best thanks for your kind testimonial, which arrived just at the right time; I hope it will have had its good effect in about a fortnight or three weeks’ time; if not, I am just as ready to go to India as Bötticher is.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, January 26, 1854.

‘Since Christmas I have not had a quiet moment, though it is our vacation. . . . I have had to go constantly to London to talk to missionaries and others. The alphabet is now printed, and yesterday we had a general conference at Bunsen’s, where all missionary societies were represented. There are many difficulties, and I am tired of the whole thing, for it takes up so much of my time, and it is difficult to fit all missionaries with the same cap! I was quite alone here in Oxford at Christmas, to write my treatise on the alphabet, which had to be printed before the New Year. Since then I have been living between Oxford and London, and have thus met many interesting people, which is always a good thing. Bunsen now begins to believe in war, but always says, if the Russians can find a back door, they will yield. But England begins to feel it has had enough, and when they once begin war here, diplomacy can do nothing; for it is the people that make war here, not the sovereign and ministers. It was very cold early in January and I had some skating. How curious that you should just have been at Jessnitz when the old grandmother died! One need not lament her death, for her soul must have longed to be free from its old body. No doubt the soul must find it difficult in childhood to accustom itself to the human body, and it takes many years before it is quite at home. Then for a time all goes well, and the soul hardly knows it is hidden in a strange garment, till the body begins to be weakly, and can no longer do all the soul wishes, and presses it everywhere, so that the soul appears to lose all outward freedom and movement. Then one can well understand that we long to be gone, and death is a true deliverance. God always knows best, when the right time comes. I have just been reading Rückert's poems; they are very beautiful in spite of a certain weakness, and his latest home poems are full of natural feeling.'

Though much time and thought had been given to the missionary alphabet, Max Müller's real interest was with the second volume of the Rig-veda, which was published early in this year. The preface is dated Christmas, 1853, and the printing had been finished by that date, but there was always some delay about the binding and publishing, which were not in Max Müller's hands. With the text of the Hymns in this volume there had not been much difficulty, but the MSS. of Sâyana's Commentary were most defective. Max Müller, before finishing the first volume, had written to India to obtain, at his own expense, new MSS. for the second. After long delay he heard that the MSS. which Dr. Roer had secured for him in Calcutta had been lost by shipwreck. Fortunately, Professor Wilson received just at this time a complete copy of the Commentary from Benares, the most ancient copy of Sâyana that had then come to Europe. This he generously gave to his young friend. It contained many emendations and corrections, which greatly simplified the editor's labour. The task had been further lightened by the work of other Vedic scholars, who, since Max Müller had begun his edition, had published many of the works alluded to by Sâyana, which, for his first volume, Max had had to copy and collate for himself, before he could verify the innumerable quotations. The Sâma-veda had been published by Benfey, and the Yajur-veda by Weber, whilst Stenzler, Roth, and Whitney had all been active in this field of Sanskrit literature. To all these writers Max Müller acknowledges his indebtedness, and also gratefully mentions the assistance and active co-operation of his secretary, Dr. Aufrecht, in the latter part of Vol. II—‘my learned friend,’ as he calls him, and adds, ‘The benefit of his services cannot be too highly valued.’ The preface ends with an eloquent tribute to his master and friend, Eugène Burnouf, whose death in 1852 had been an almost irreparable personal loss to Max Müller, as well as to all Sanskrit students:—

‘In losing Burnouf we have lost, not only an indefatigable fellow labourer, not only a disinterested teacher, but a most respected judge; in his approval valued by all, in his censure feared, in his verdict distinguished unfailingly by fairness and by truth. . . . When I heard of his death I felt—and I believe that many engaged in similar studies shared the feeling—as if our work had lost much of its charm and its purpose. “What will Burnouf say?” was my earliest thought on completing the first volume of the Rig-veda. And now as I finish the second, in its turn submitted to the judgement of so many scholars whose friendship I value, and whose learning I admire, my thoughts turn again to him who is no longer among us, and I think, not without sadness, of what his judgement would have been.’

Early in February the long uncertainty about the Taylorian Professorship was brought to a close by Max Müller’s nomination by the Curators, confirmed by Convocation on February 21. The Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Cotton, in writing to announce the unanimous election by the Curators, adds, ‘I feel great satisfaction in the consideration that so eminent and talented a Professor has been elected.’ He hastens to announce his success:—

TO F. PALGRAVE, ESQ.

February 8, 1854.

‘The Professorship has been settled at last, and I got it. I cannot tell you how happy I feel, after the long suspense, to have at last a ποῦ στῶ for the rest of this life, and to be able to look on quietly till the moving panorama comes to an end. I feel now more than ever that it is owing to the kindness of those who first received me at Oxford that I owe my further success and my present position—ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte, and after I was once in the right boat, I was sure to get into harbour sooner or later. I shall write to old Joe. I wish we could all meet again and have a jolly party, as we used to have five or six years ago, when I little thought of what was looming in the future. I hope we shall manage a little gathering after Froude is able to come. He has taken a cottage at Babbicombe for the next year. I was in London for a week, kept from day to day by alphabetic conferences, where I had to act as secretary and to write generally till 3 o'clock in the morning. I had not an hour to myself, and after it was over I had to go to Oxford in order to see that all was going right about the ship. Now it is launched, and I hope to have a pleasant cruise in it.

'Ever yours, M. M.'

Bunsen wrote at once to congratulate:—

Translation.

February 8.

'... Your position in life now rests on a firm foundation, . . . and that in this heaven-blest, secure, free island, and at a moment when it is hard to say whether the thrones of princes or the freedom of nations is in greatest danger. With true affection, yours.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, March 10.

'I am living in such a turmoil that I can settle to nothing, and have hardly time to write a letter. I have been made full Professor this term, and so there have been endless invitations and parties of all sorts. I am rather tired of it all, and wish I lived some miles out of Oxford, so as to have my time to myself. You can imagine I was not a little pleased when everything was definitely settled, but when one waits so long for a thing it does not give one the same pleasure as when it comes unexpectedly. But I heartily thank God that my future is now entirely secured, as far as food and raiment are concerned! At present I shall stay where I am, and I shall be very sorry to leave, but I know I must take a larger house in time. I shall stay here till the Summer Vacation, and then when I come back I will furnish a small house, in which you can perhaps help me. Or perhaps you will pay me a visit in the vacation here, instead of my going to Dresden? I have still a good deal of correspondence with missionaries, who are not always easy to deal with. Aufrecht is still working for me, but he lives in another house for himself, and gives private lessons. He is happy here, and very useful to me, but it is rather expensive. I shall not want for money, when I think with how little I managed once. I enclose a little proof of my Professorship; you will know what use to make of it. If you want to buy a book,

I would recommend Tauler's Sermons ; they are very beautiful, but you must get an edition in modernized German. We already begin to feel the war. Everything is dearer, and the taxes will be doubled. It can't be helped, and there is no doubt as to the result.'

On March 21, three days before war was declared against Russia, Max Müller received a letter from Sir Charles Trevelyan, then Assistant-Secretary to the Treasury, begging officially for his help in directing the officers proceeding to the East how to study the languages of the northern division of the Turkish Empire and the adjoining provinces of Russia. Some private letters had already passed between Sir Charles and the Professor of Modern European Languages, and Max Müller had written :

'That corner of Europe between the North of Italy and Turkey and along the Danube is a real linguistic rookery. All the lost daughters of the European families of languages have taken refuge there ; and they exhibit, each, the lowest degradation and corruption of grammar that can be imagined. In the Albanian we recognize the noble features of Greek ; in Wallachian, those of Latin ; in Bulgarian, those of the Old Slavonic language ; but all sadly distorted and disfigured. Very little has been done toward a literary culture of these dialects, and even grammars are scarce ; there are certainly none in English, as far as I am aware.'

He had prepared a list of elementary grammars and a few simple instructions, which Sir Charles had imparted to all the commissariat officers. But the letter, dated March 20, states that something more than this should be attempted, and adds, 'If you agree with me in this, you will at once feel that there is a call upon you to help in this good work' ; and Sir Charles entreats Max Müller to prepare at once a treatise, showing what languages are spoken in that part of the world, their general structure, and the alphabets used, and what would be the most useful books on the respective languages. Sir Charles concludes thus : 'I have only two further suggestions to make. (1) That whatever you do should be done quickly. Every part of this great effort is under war pressure. (2) That you should tell us at once what you know now, leaving the rest to be perfected hereafter.' So heartily did Max Müller respond to the call, that by May 16 he was able to send Sir Charles his Suggestions for the Assistance of Officers in learning the Languages of the Seat of War in the East. A second edition was required within a year.

In his introductory letter to Sir Charles he first called attention to a subject that continued to occupy his thoughts almost to the end of his life. He writes:—

‘It is undoubtedly high time that something should be done to encourage the study of Oriental languages in England. At the very outset of this war, it has been felt how much this branch of studies—in emergencies like the present so requisite—has been neglected in the system of our education. In all other countries which have any political, commercial, or religious connexions with the East, provision has been made, by Government or otherwise, to encourage young men to devote themselves to this branch of studies. Russia has always been a most liberal patron of Oriental philology. In the Academy of St. Petersburg there is a chair for every branch of Oriental literature. The French Government has founded a school, ‘L’école pour les langues orientales vivantes.’ At Vienna there is an Oriental seminary. Prussia finds it expedient to give encouragement to young Oriental scholars, employed afterwards with advantage as consuls and interpreters. In England alone, where the most vital interests are involved in a free intercourse with the East, hardly anything is done to foster Oriental studies.’

Just before the publication of his book, Max writes to Bunsen:—

Translation.

PARK PLACE, 1854.

‘I am busy with my lectures, and am printing my book on the Languages of the Seat of War, 100 pages, with a very fine map by Petermann, so that I never get to bed before 2 a.m.’

To his mother he writes:—

Translation.

PARK PLACE, April 11.

‘I am so engrossed with work, that I have hardly a free minute, and that will go on till vacation. I cannot feel certain about my plans for travelling. I must spend part of the vacation in Paris, as I must work at a MS. in the library there. The only thing that draws me to Germany is Auguste, who cannot well leave Chemnitz, otherwise life in Dresden or Dessau is not very attractive, and we might all meet nicely in Paris, if Emilia would come there. Time becomes more precious every year, and a quarter of a year is now as important to one as a year was formerly. This shows one is no longer young. One becomes economical with one's time, and life is so serious just now, one has no right to think of pleasure, when so many men are suffering. And yet it is a war that could not be avoided. The Russian lust of conquest and the whole influence of Russia in Europe, especially in Germany, must be thrown back on its own borders, or we should have to fight the battles which are now being fought on the Danube, on the Elbe or Rhine. It will be a terrible war, but one cannot doubt the issue, for England, when war once begins, puts forth her whole strength, and the feeling that you are fighting for a just cause keeps up the courage even in disaster.'

But whilst realizing the necessity of the war, Max Müller was to be indirectly one of the many sufferers from it. His friend and patron, Bunsen, could not approve the attitude of Prussia, and it was widely known that his recall from England was imminent. George Bunsen, Max Müller's most intimate friend of all Bunsen's sons, writes to him :

CARLTON TERRACE, April 14.

'DEAREST FRIEND,—So it is. My father has not up to this moment received a recall. On the other hand, we expect to-morrow the reply to an answer sent by my father to a renewed and very impetuous offer of leave of absence. In this answer my father made his accepting leave of absence dependent on certain conditions guaranteeing his political honour. If the reply to-morrow does not contain those conditions, nothing remains but for my father to send in his resignation.'

TO F. PALGRAVE, ESQ.

9, PARK PLACE, April 18, 1854.

'... I should like to have seen you when you heard of Scott's appointment. I am afraid you did not use quite parliamentary language on the occasion; I neither, particularly as, up to the last, Jowett's chances seemed as clear and certain as could be, without downright bargaining. I am sorry to see that Jowett feels it very much, and I think just now some testimonial from his friends, like the one you contemplated some time ago, would be very opportune. Could you persuade Richmond to do his portrait? I think it might be done for about £100, and I am sure we could get as much from his friends. What do you say? Vacation is nearly over, and I have not yet been away, though I intended to go to the seaside and get fresh air. But I have to do some work for the Government, and have been at it day and night, working against time. I hope we shall hear something from the Black Sea soon. The slowness of these people is intolerable ; they are always a day too late. I congratulate Bunsen on having got out of the claws of the Black Eagle. I dare say he will get the next vacant seat on the Episcopal bench in England !

‘Ever yours, M. M.’

Besides the work for the Government, Max Müller was busy in printing his essay on the Turanian languages for Bunsen’s book, which had grown under his hands, and had had to be put aside whilst the missionary alphabet was printing. The dilatoriness of the printers in London caused him and Bunsen much trouble, as the work had to be finished before Bunsen left England, and though Max Müller worked through half the night whenever a proof-sheet appeared, his letters are full of despair. Bunsen writes on May 10, ‘The work presses,’ but did not seem to realize that the delay was not with Max nor in Oxford. In the same letter the Minister, writing for the last time from Carlton Terrace, says, ‘The house is deserted, but the heart rejoices, and the soul already spreads its wings.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, May 12.

‘Bunsen’s resignation is a real loss to me. I saw him in London—the house is now empty. Yet one can only congratulate him on having saved his good name, at the right moment. His leaving gave me a great deal of work and disturbance. He is just bringing out a new book in seven volumes. I had various things to write for him, and as it had to be ready by the twentieth, I never got to bed before two. Now I have undertaken a work for Government, which is just printed. Then came the lectures, and the Veda above all, so that I really have not a moment to think of or do anything else, and can say nothing about my plans for summer.’

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

OXFORD, May 22.

‘I cannot believe that you think of leaving England. Surely the Prussian crisis cannot last much longer, and when it is over, you will have to return to Carlton Terrace. Whilst writing the word believe, I think of a question I meant to ask. To believe, as far as I know, means “to be”—lieben ; Lat. libere and lubere.’

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

OXFORD, June 8.

‘Are you really leaving as soon as Acland tells me ? If this is so, I must go to London on Saturday or Sunday, the only days I can get away, as I am giving my lectures. I still wait, and still hope, a new Prussia will arise, which cannot do without you here in England. England begins to feel like a strange land to me, when I think that you are really going. Will you not wait till Hippolytus is out? The printer does not seem in any hurry.'

On June 12 Bunsen, writing to his wife, who had gone to Heidelberg to settle his future home, mentions that he had had 'a delightful day with Max Müller.' Five days later, this faithful friend left England, and Max felt as if stranded in a foreign land. Too much occupied at this time with his work to write more than very short letters to his mother, in all of them he expresses his sense of loss. Bunsen's house in London had been a second home to him, where he was always sure of a welcome, always sure of encouragement and sympathy, of intellectual intercourse, and of that intelligent interest in his work and the far-reaching problems which it unfolded, which he missed so sorely in his daily life in Oxford, where hardly any one understood the work on which he was engaged, or took a real interest in it, or were capable of discussing it with him scientifically.

'In all my researches,' he writes in the Autobiography, 'no one took a livelier interest or encouraged me more than Bunsen. When some of my translations of the Vedic Hymns seemed fairly satisfactory, I used to take them to him, and he was always delighted at seeing a little more of that ancient Aryan torso, though . . . he was more especially interested in Egyptian chronology and archaeology. Often when I was alone with him, we discussed the chronological and psychological dates of Egyptian and Aryan antiquity.'

The last left of the daughters of that large and happy family writes:—

TO MRS. MAX MÜLLER.

CARLSRUHE, December 13, 1901.

'My memory now only recalls impressions of your dear husband. The charm of his whole being, his beautiful, almost Greek profile, his wonderful playing, specially of Mendelssohn and Chopin, and delightful power of interesting and fascinating one by his conversation, all that is still very clear and warm in my recollection; and we girls all fully understood my father's admiration, and fatherly love, and interest in him. . . . He did not live in Carlton Terrace with us, only came in and out, and of course was chiefly closeted with my father in his library below ; and we only saw him at meals, or when he had time to look us up in the drawing-rooms, and there, I well remember, we tried as soon as possible to get him to sit at the pianoforte and play to us.

‘Very truly yours,

‘EMILIA VON BUNSEN.’

It was soon after the parting with his friend and patron that Max Müller heard from Sir Charles Trevelyan that he was thoroughly satisfied with his treatise : ‘ I cannot bestow higher praise upon it than by saying that it appears to me completely to answer the important object for which it was written.’ Bunsen, too, wrote : ‘ I read your book . . . with real delight and sincere admiration.’

The following letter from Dr. John Muir, the editor of Original Sanskrit Texts, or the Origin and History of the People of India, and later the munificent founder of the Sanskrit Professorship in Edinburgh, then just returned from twenty-five years’ service in India, contains the first mention of a man of whom Max Müller always spoke with reverential affection :—

33, SUSSEX GARDENS, June 26, 1854.

‘MY DEAR SIR,—It may interest you to know that there is at present in London a Pundit from Benares, though he has become a Christian. He has come to England with the Maharaja Duleep Singh, as a sort of tutor or companion to His Highness. His name is Nehemiah Nilkanth, the former appellation having been adopted by him according to his own wish on the occasion of his baptism. He was not a professed Pundit in the sense of being a teacher of Sanskrit Grammar, or of any of the Six Darsanas or any other branch, but he is a Sanskrit scholar, being able to write the language accurately and fluently, and having a general knowledge of the philosophical schools. At the commencement of his inquiries into Christianity, he wrote an answer to one of my tracts (a former edition of the Mataparikshā), composed in Sanskrit verse. After long and painful inquiries and struggles, he became convinced of the truth of Christianity, which he accordingly embraced. He has latterly been employed as a catechist ; and when Dr. Login (who has charge of the Maharaja) was leaving India, he brought Nilkanth along with him.

‘If, therefore, you are curious to see a specimen of a Pundit without going beyond London, your wish can be gratified, and if you desire it, I shall be glad to go with you to Dr. Login at Mivart's in Brook Street, if you are likely to be soon in London. Nilkanth, since his conversion, has written a tract in Hindoo against the Vedānta, which is interesting as an exposition of what he considers the doctrine of that school. He knew some English when I last saw him, and is probably improved in his knowledge of it now.

‘Believe me, yours very faithfully,

‘JOHN MUIR.’

Nehemiah Goreh came to Oxford to see Max Müller, and they became, after a short time, very intimate. Nehemiah had suffered cruelly for his change of religion, and on his return to India his mind seems to have lost its balance, and after some years of asceticism and complete renunciation of the world, he joined the branch of the Cowley Fathers established in India. Up to that time, he had written to and heard from Max Müller from time to time. When he revisited England and Oxford many years later, he was so completely under the discipline of the Brotherhood, that it was only the very day that he left Oxford, where he had spent many weeks, that he was allowed to visit his old friend for a few moments, and the visit gave little pleasure to either. ‘He was steeped in the Christianity of the Church,’ which Max always distinguished from ‘the Christianity of Christ.’

In July Max Müller went to Germany, and with his mother revisited his sister and many other relations.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

CHEMNITZ, July 30, 1854.

‘I received your last friendly letter from Heidelberg, just as I had struck my tent in Oxford, and was on my way to Germany. Since then I have been always on the move from place to place, and never had any rest or a moment for writing. Now I have finished my visits, and am going on a few longer expeditions, and your kind invitation draws me westward to Heidelberg, and thence I hope to go to Switzerland, North Italy, Venice, and Vienna. My plan is to start in a few days with my mother, to pay a few visits on the way, to see Rückert and reach Heidelberg about the middle of August. I hope to stay there with my mother for a fortnight, and as it is not so far from Heidelberg to your house as from the City to the West End, I hope to renew the happy hours which, only a short time ago,

I could spend with you in Carlton Terrace. I do not know Heidelberg, and your account has made me long to see the Academia Nicorina. Then I hope we shall be reconciled about Aryans or Iranians, about which I do not care to speak from Chemnitz, as no philological wind blows here. The middle of August I expect some friends in Heidelberg, perhaps Jowett, and we may go on together to Italy and Vienna. Unfortunately I must be back by October 1, as the Election takes place then. I have not yet heard whether the Bill has been sent back to the Commons, and what changes have been made in it, but I fear I must be at my post by the beginning of term. The parties are nearly equal, and each vote tells. Dissenters are admitted, but Gladstone has done much harm, and the Commissioners are very much restricted in carrying out the needed reforms, at least in what concerns the colleges. The advance of public opinion in Oxford is remarkable, when one thinks how quickly it has come.'

After a pleasant time in Heidelberg, where he was able to introduce to his friends his dearly loved mother, of whom Bunsen writes later as 'your remarkable mother,' Max Müller joined his old friend Baron Hagedorn, and with him visited Worms, Speyer, Baden-Baden, and the Black Forest, and went on alone to spend a week at Vienna with his friend Robert Morier, then secretary at the English Embassy. Italy had to be given up on account of cholera. From Vienna he went again for a time to his mother in Dresden, and finally returned to Oxford early in October, where he tells his mother he had a rapturous welcome from his little dog Belle. He writes on his return that he is feeling so very well that he has no qualms of conscience over his three months' idleness, and adds, 'If we can be together three months in the year, free from all cares, we can bear the other nine months, and if the parting is always very painful, it is made up for by the joy of meeting.'

During the summer, Max Müller received from time to time, through Sir Charles Trevelyan, letters from officers, consuls, and others on his Languages of the Seat of War, many of them containing valuable corrections which he embodied in the second edition. The consul at Mitylene wrote, 'I have received Müller's admirable memoir, and must thank him for the pleasure and instruction it has afforded me. It is like letting in broad daylight on a subject which had been hitherto explored by a farthing rushlight.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

November 11, 1854.

'I tried on your birthday to play a little, but I have no time now for such things. I have a great deal of work in prospect, and however great the delight I feel in music and art, my work comes before everything else. My free time I must give to walking, which is most necessary; and to get stronger exercise I play racquets, which makes one perspire even more than camomile tea. When one is nearly thirty-one, one must be economical of one's time, and give up many things that are a pleasure, but for which one's time is too precious. How many things I would like to read, but there is no time, and I must be content. One's delight in music always lasts, and I owe the old instrument so much—not only the enjoyment one has had, and the use my music has been as an introduction in a foreign place, but also the happy frame of mind which music unconsciously produces in one, and it smooths many little roughnesses which one often sees in those who have no taste for music. People who cannot sing are almost as badly off as people who cannot cry, but one does not always want to cry, nor always to sing; if we know that we can, it is enough.'

In this same letter he mentions that the cholera had been so bad in Oxford—worse than anywhere else in England—that the lectures had, many of them, been postponed.

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 10.

'I must thank you for all your love, which is the best of birthday gifts. As I took up your birthday letter, I wondered where the smell of violets came from, and when I opened it and found them, the scent was as fresh as if they were just picked; and even now, as your letter lies on my table, they have not lost it. Your letter too is full of love and goodness, which remains ever fresh. But I must tell you I was not in Oxford on my birthday, but in Bideford. I was first with Froude, who lives at Torquay, and then I went with him to Bideford to stay with Kingsley. He is a well-known writer, and his last novel Hypatia has made a great sensation. He is married to a sister of Froude's wife, and they are both charming. I played to them on my birthday, and thought of you. . . . I shall probably be quietly in Oxford at Christmas, unless I go to George Bunsen's wedding; he is engaged to an English lady. . . . Here one hears of nothing but the war . . . the losses are very great. Taxes are very high, six per cent. now, and we are to be prepared for ten per cent.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 28.

'I spent Christmas quietly here, for I had wasted so much time that it was high time to begin my work again. On Monday, as I was drinking my coffee, came your letter, and soon after I received your picture, which I like very much. . . . I made acquaintance this time in London with Macaulay, and had a long conversation with him on the teaching necessary for the young men who are sent out to India. He is very clear headed, and extraordinarily eloquent.'

This must be the interview so humorously described in Auld Lang Syne, where the young Professor, primed with every possible argument in favour of Oriental studies, had to sit silent for an hour whilst the historian poured forth his diametrically opposite views, and then dismissed his visitor, who had tried in vain to utter a single word. 'I went back to Oxford,' says Max Müller, 'a sadder, and, I hope, a wiser man.'

The New Year found Max Müller quietly at work in Oxford. He had been to London, intending to accompany his friend George Bunsen to Norfolk for his wedding, but serious illness in the bride's family prevented any but the nearest relatives from being present. Max's mother had been urging him to follow his friend's example—a favourite theme with her—and she amused herself from time to time in recommending him a wife.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, January.

'That you are so anxious to find me a wife is very good of you! But I am afraid there are difficulties, and in such things we must take life as God sends it. A happy marriage must be a great blessing, but how few marriages are happy. I have no opportunity of really knowing and observing young girls, as one can if one lives at home, and where families know each other, and live much together. I should not fall in love with a merely pretty face, and for a mariage de convenance there is plenty of time. Elise, who delighted you so much in Carlsbad, seemed to me pleasant enough; but, as I had no opportunity of knowing her better, I have never thought more about her. If you are writing, greet her kindly, but don't make any proposals for her hand! Perhaps if Krug sends you this year to Carlsbad, you can tell me if she is the sort of daughter-in-law you would like.

Sunday is my best day for writing letters, as I get up early, and go at eight o'clock to our chapel, and have the whole day then to myself. Getting up so early at this time of the year is not pleasant; but the chapels here in the colleges are so beautiful, so warm, and so well arranged that one is far more comfortable in them than in our large cold churches.'

Bunsen had written to him earlier in the month to express his pleasure that Max Müller 'would undertake to bring the last sevenfold child of my English love' (Christianity and Mankind, in seven volumes) 'into public notice. You know better than any one what is the unity of the seven volumes, and what is the aim and result. Your own is certainly an important and independent part of it. But you have, with old affection, worked and thought yourself into the whole, even when the particulars were of less interest to you.' To this the following answer was sent:—

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, OXFORD, January 14, 1855.

'Philip Pusey seems quite unexpectedly better. Acland had very little hope, but thinks it quite possible now that his life will be spared. He is living still with his brother in Oxford, and as I have had little intercourse with the latter, I cannot call there to inquire. His brother has engaged a tutor for Sidney, who now reads with him, but his chief studies are Pusey's folios, the Patres and the Haeretici. Oxford is in a sad condition; the reform has done nothing, and we are worse off than before. Balliol has declared that Dissenters will not be admitted; but the minority has appealed to the Bishop of Lincoln, who has cancelled the resolution. Gladstone's Bill has introduced a complicated and impractical system, which suffocates all proposals for the better. There is only one chance of salvation for Oxford—fellowships open to all and no clerical restrictions. If this were done we should have a very different Oxford in about twenty years. At present lay-fellows are only admitted as fellows for a certain period—if they are admitted to an open fellowship at all. What remains therefore is nothing but the coffee-grounds which nobody desires to have—clergymen without a parish and scholars without scholarships! I often long to get away. I cannot, especially as a German, take part in these things; my old friends leave, and I have no wish to make new ones, and so the MSS. of the Veda are my one consolation.

'I have written a review on the philological part of your work; I told Dasent<sup>1</sup> about it a fortnight ago, but I have had no answer so far.

<sup>1</sup> Editor of the Times.

‘Aufrecht has at last made up his mind to go to London. I have written to Dr. Jelf, who may probably secure for him the Sanskrit Professorship at King’s College. I shall look out for somebody later on, who will do the mechanical work of copying and compiling, so that I shall only have the constructing of the text to do. Aufrecht was too good for this mechanical work. I do hope he will succeed better in London than here. . . . I think of going to Paris in the summer, to study there, and to get acquainted with the people, if only there were no Exhibition. And what about the war?—I hope there will be no peace till Sebastopol has fallen.’

(Continuation on Monday.)

‘I received your letter this morning, which made me reflect, Alia iacta est, but where and how? The old Prussia is lost, and a new one can only rise from a Protestant, constitutional Germany. The hour for that must soon be at hand, for I do not believe in the peace negotiations. If once the struggle becomes widespread, it will be the voice of the people that will secure the welfare of the Fatherland. In war and in peace, in death and in life, the people must have a voice, and it could never wait for the word of command to emanate from one family. Peace now would be a great disaster.

‘I wish the notice of your book had fallen into better hands. Dasent told me that the second part of his review of the first edition had not passed the censor<sup>1</sup>, and so had never been printed. After hearing this, I did what I could, i.e. I explained the connexion of the whole—but it is for the Times, and the times are bad!’

It will be observed that in the beginning of this letter Max Müller speaks of having had little intercourse with Dr. Pusey. When he was made an M.A. of Christ Church, he attended chapel regularly, and Dr. Pusey at once announced that he would never administer the Holy Communion to him, as he had only been confirmed in the Lutheran Church—not by a bishop! The Dean, Dr. Gaisford, at once said that he had no scruples of the sort. This, of course, made a feeling of estrangement for some years between Dr. Pusey and the young Professor; but it passed away gradually, and in 1860, at the time of the election to the Sanskrit Professorship, it is well known that Max Müller had no warmer supporter or more energetic canvasser than Dr. Pusey, who sat up many nights writing letters in his favour. Max always remembered and alluded to this with gratitude. His feelings about Pusey form some of the most interesting passages in the Autobiography. Their religious views were far asunder. Max Müller, who, as he tells us, had learnt his practical religion from his mother, which remained unshaken amidst all storms, could not sympathize with the utter terror with which Dr. Pusey looked back on his own religious difficulties, as if they were in themselves a crime. Max always felt that 'religion, in order to be real religion, a man's own religion, must be searched for, must be discovered, must be conquered. If it is simply inherited, or accepted as a matter of course, it often happens that in later years it falls away, and has either to be reconquered, or to be replaced by another religion.'

<sup>1</sup> Mr. Walter, proprietor of the Times, saw almost all articles that touched on religious subjects.

How completely all distrust of Max Müller had passed from Dr. Pusey's mind, is shown by the following extract from a letter from his daughter, Mrs. Brine :—

'... I remember well the happy walks my father and I used to have through the Parks up to your house, when he wanted to consult Professor Max Müller on some abstruse questions. You know the very high esteem in which my father held the Professor.'

In February Bunsen writes to Max Müller :—

Translation.

'I am delighted to hear that your Veda gets on. If you would only not allow yourself to be frightened from the attempt to let others work for you in mere handicraft. You have now fixed your impress on the work, and any one with the will, and with the necessary knowledge of the tools, could not go far wrong under your eye. I should so like to see you free for other work. Only do not leave Oxford. You would not like Germany, and Germany could offer you no sphere of activity that could be compared ever so distantly with your present position. So do not be low-spirited, my dear M., or impatient. It is not so much the fault of England, as of yourself, that you do not feel settled and at home. You have now as good a position as a young man of intellect, and with a future before him, could possibly have anywhere, either in England or Germany. Make a home for yourself. Since I saw your remarkable mother, I have been convinced that, unlike many mothers, she would not stand in the way of your domestic happiness, even were it contrary to her own views.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

February 25, 1855.

'There has not been such a winter in England for twenty years—even the Thames is frozen over, and here in Oxford the cold was unbearable, for the open fires are not as warm as a German stove. The one pleasure is the skating, which one generally gets for a couple of days only—this frost has lasted for weeks. You must have felt the cold, if you have carried out your stove-economies, and used a lamp instead of fire. I am very busy with my lectures, and am printing a second edition of my Languages of the Seat of War, and there are many other things which fill up my time. The war becomes more complicated, but we must hope that they will not make peace hurriedly, so that the victims will have fallen in vain. Here people are very much excited, chiefly from the constant change of Ministers and the incapacity of the highest officials. It is a real revolution, only such crises pass over quietly here, but the effect is the same. The aristocratic party must yield before it comes to street fighting. I have made no plans for the summer. I must stay here during vacation, unless I go to Paris for work. If you have really meanwhile found a wife for me, that may make a difference, but I am not at all inclined for one!'

In March, Max Müller tells his mother of a visit to London, where he had made acquaintance with Lord Ashburton, 'one of the richest peers in England, and a patron of literature.' He stayed with his friend George Bunsen, and laments that his pleasant, amiable, and rich wife has no sister to take the place of Elise of Carlsbad, who was going to be married, much to his mother's disappointment! True to his determination to spare his mother all anxiety, he never betrayed what his real feelings were.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, OXFORD, April 15, 1855.

'... I chiefly work at the Veda now, and have just sent an essay on Vedic burials to the German Oriental Journal. It is always the same story with Aufrecht, and, alas, no position seems to turn up for him. Jowett has been in London for the whole term; his Commentary is printed and is to appear soon. I expect few facts, but free and open treatment of the matter. Tischendorff appeared here in Oxford with all his various Orders and MSS. I hope to get the latter accepted by the Bodleian. Are they really worth £800 after having been collated and edited?'

On April 17 Bunsen wrote to thank Max Müller for an article on his Outlines :—

Translation.

‘You have so thoroughly adopted the English disguise that it will not be easy for any one to suspect you of having written this “curious article.” It especially delights me to see how ingeniously you contrive to say what you announce you do not wish to discuss, i.e. the purport of the theology. In short, we are all of opinion that your cousin was right when she said of you in Paris to Neukomm, that you ought to be in the diplomatic service!’

The letter goes on to sketch out a new work in which Bunsen was anxious for Max Müller’s co-operation, The Kosmos of Language, in four volumes—the second and fourth volumes to be entirely the work of Max Müller, and half of volume three—and Bunsen asks his friend to Heidelberg, or to Nice in the winter, to discuss the whole scheme.

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, OXFORD, April 26, 1855.

‘Alas! I cannot send any definite answer to your kind proposals. My news from home are bad. My mother has been very ill and her recovery is very slow. She is ordered to go to Carlsbad in the summer, and wishes me to go with her, and this seems almost impossible. Last year even I meant to go to Paris to study there, and to occupy myself with the collation and copying of various MSS. I have been hindered for several years in concluding and finishing various works of mine by not knowing these said MSS. My plan therefore is to spend the summer in Paris, and to give some years entirely to the close study of the Veda, and therefore meanwhile to let the Science of Language alone. The second part of the review in the Times has after all appeared amidst cries and wailing. Nobody seems to know in the least who is the writer of the article, and I have already assisted in various Common Rooms to abuse it, without betraying myself by the movement of a muscle. The gloom here is widespread. As it was said of France in 1847, “La France s’ennuie,” so it may be said here now, John Bull is sulky. He has still thought it possible that men like Aberdeen, Clarendon, Palmerston, &c., could at least have brought Austria round. But as he sees that even that could not be managed, he turns disagreeable. Parliament will have to be dissolved, and a numerous national party will choose statesmen like Layard, Lowe, Bright, Cobden, &c. Whigs and Tories are done for.’

It was in this spring that Max Müller joined in a delightful geological excursion to Malvern, which he often mentioned later with unfeigned delight. The following account is from one of the party, Canon Farrar:—

‘It was in 1855 that I had the opportunity of knowing Max Müller more closely, and seeing his mind employed on a new subject, Geology, in an interesting excursion to the Malvern Hills under the guidance of Professor Phillips, who wisely proposed to utilize the three days’ vacation which at that time separated the two summer terms at Whitsuntide, by taking a party to visit the igneous formations of the Malvern Hills. The party was of graduates, except one gentleman commoner. The only survivor besides myself is the Rev. H. F. Tozer. We hired a country hotel at Malvern Wells, and thence made excursions under the Professor’s guidance. Müller was one of the party. He had only lately taken up the subject of Geology; the practical application of it in field work was new to him, and therefore he afforded unintentionally to us the means of watching the workings of his mind, both in observation and reflection. I recall at the interval of forty-six years his looks of surprise and of intelligent delight. He was amazed by the mineralogical transformations, but what struck him most was the odd fragments which were indications of obliterated rock formations. He was fascinated by the inferences which Phillips drew. I cannot but suspect that there was in his mind the perception of the close analogy offered by his own favourite study of the history of language. These fragments of early strata were parallel to the presence of roots or old forms of words embedded in later linguistic strata. The second day of our stay was Sunday: most of the party gave themselves a holiday, and did not go to church. But Phillips and Müller accompanied me and some others to the Abbey Church of Great Malvern. I hope that I am not lifting indelicately the veil from sacred acts, if I say that it being Whit-Sunday, and there being Communion, to my surprise both Müller and Phillips stopped to partake of the Communion. I name this, for the reason that I suppose that in Oxford it would have been thought that the two men just named were, though Christians in life, most indefinite in their religious views, and probably suspected of excessive broadness. The sight of these two laymen, whose stay at the Eucharist must of course have been prompted solely by sincere religious principle, impressed me much; it was a rebuke to many of us clergymen, and led me to a life-long conviction that a depth of Christian purpose without formal profession exists in many a heart, undiscovered by man, and I often thought of this occurrence, when Müller, at the time of his rejection for the Sanskrit chair, was unfairly charged with the irrelevant question of Rationalism. After the service, our small party mounted to the top of the hills and listened to Phillips pointing out not only the physical and topographical geography of the vast panorama, but explaining the reasons by which he reproduced the probable configuration of the country, of land and sea, at the distant period of the elevation of the hills. This again seemed to impress Müller deeply. While he revelled in the beauty of the scene, he had never before heard physical geography in a large landscape connected with geology, with the extinct flora and fauna made to live again in Phillips' description. Our next day, Monday, was spent in a fatiguing walk along the southern half of the hills. Here Müller had for the first time the opportunity of seeing two British camps; one of them, the Herefordshire beacon, of gigantic size and remarkable construction, to which ancient German camps offer hardly any parallel. Müller showed an equal interest in archaeological as in geological history.'

For the May Term of this year Max Müller announced for the first time a course of reading and working lectures, 'sine ulla solennitate,' and from this time onwards gave one such course each year. This first class was for reading extracts from German classics to illustrate the history of German literature. His lectures continued to be well attended; there are above seventy names of undergraduates in one term for certificates of attendance, and the more private classes were also very popular. The wide range of investigation which Max Müller contrived to bring within the scope of modern languages and literature and the vivacity and picturesqueness with which every subject was treated were totally unlike the usual professorial lecture, and he continued to attract large audiences till tutorial teaching gradually destroyed the attendance at Professors' lectures.

Early in June, Max Müller was placed on the commission for the examination of the candidates for the Civil Service of India, and appointed examiner in Sanskrit. The preliminary meetings he found very interesting, and the constant visits to London gave him opportunities of seeing many old friends. He was busy with the examination in July, and was then asked to undertake the German and French examinations for commissions in the Engineers and Artillery, which included the history and literature as well as the grammar of both languages.

The middle of August Max Müller settled himself in Paris, glad to have the change from England and all the work he had been doing. He found Gathy and other old friends there, and began to work at collating and copying the MSS. he had specially come to see. His mother, however, when she knew that the sea no longer separated them, became impatient to see him, and the end of the month he started for Dresden, where he stayed a fortnight.

On his return from Dresden he found Paris so full for the Exhibition that it was with difficulty he secured a room for himself, and an apartment for his cousin Emilie and her husband Prince Wilhelm. Princess Friedrich of Anhalt-Dessau and her two daughters were also in Paris, and, as Max Müller soon found, he was expected to act as cicerone to the whole party; so he gave up all idea of work, and spent the short time that remained before his return to England in a round of amusements. He tells his mother he was never quiet from morning till night, and that he had explored Paris again from end to end. There were delightful excursions to Fontainebleau and Versailles, constant visits to the Exhibition, whilst almost every evening was spent at the theatre. The princesses, accustomed to a stiff little German court, were delighted with the freedom of the life, the dinners at the cafés, and the gaiety of the city, and were very pleasant and amused at everything. Max Müller, however, was not sorry when the arrival of the old family friend, Baron Hagedorn, set him free to return to his busy, yet quiet, life in England.

To his mother he writes before leaving Paris :—

Translation.

‘It is tiresome, though, that my plans for work were all upset, but it can’t be helped; one must take life as it comes, and do one’s duty by others, when it is necessary. The summer has been a happy one, and I am quite satisfied. We had a happy time together in Dresden—happier than I had dared to hope for.’

On his return home, Max Müller found himself involved in a controversy on the examinations for the Indian Civil Service. He entirely agreed that the first examination should be a test of that liberal education which can be obtained at our schools and universities, and that a small number of marks should then be given for Arabic or Sanskrit. But in the second examination he was anxious that high marks should be given for Sanskrit as the origin of nearly all the spoken languages of India, and that the vernaculars should be studied in India, when a man knew in which presidency his life would be passed, and which vernaculars he would really require. In Mr. Lowe's reconstruction of Macaulay's scheme, Sanskrit had been set aside in favour of vernaculars. Max Müller wished to see 1,000 marks for Oriental languages divided into 800 for Sanskrit and 200 for one vernacular.

The lectures this term were on 'The History of the Languages of Europe,' with again a good attendance. Great part of the term was spent in looking for a house, as the lodgings where he had lived since the autumn of 1848 were now too small for his rapidly growing library, though it had not yet attained the dimensions of later years, some 13,000 volumes. The choice of houses was very limited in those days: none of those to the north of St. Giles' Church then existed, except some half-dozen in Park Town, which was considered an impossible distance from Oxford for a Professor!

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, November 9.

'Everything goes on again as usual. Lectures, work, parties, and one day follows another without anything special to mark it. But a holiday does one good, and one's work goes on all the better after a time of thorough idleness. Only think, my poor Belle has been very ill ever since I came home, and cannot die; she is a perfect skeleton. The people say I ought to give her poison, but I can't do it, though she is hopelessly ill. . . . I have long had fires, and the weather is cold and disagreeable, just like England, and then every night I must make myself wretched with a heavy English dinner, whilst in Paris one never felt one had eaten anything. Yet Emilie will tell you we did not live so badly there!'

The end of November his faithful little companion for seven years, little Belle the terrier, so well known to his old friends, died. Max tells his mother that it had made him very unhappy, and he missed the little creature terribly.

Max Müller, who had been made an honorary M.A., as we have seen, in December, 1851, was made M.A. by Decree of Convocation on December 13 of this year.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

9, PARK PLACE, December 28.

'There is little to tell you about my Christmas. Oxford is nearly empty in the vacation, so one does not see much festivity. But the week before Christmas I enjoyed myself very much. I went to a friend (Augustus Vansittart) in Cambridge, which I had not yet seen, and most beautiful it is, in some points more beautiful than Oxford, which is saying a great deal. Everybody was very hospitable, and for a whole week I had to eat four dinners daily, for breakfast, luncheon, dinner, and supper were all like a gala dinner in Germany. Four times a day roast pheasant, and never in bed before 2 o'clock. It was real feasting, and I am only surprised that I could eat my way through without headaches. I came back through London, and dined with one of the Ministers, where I met . . . Sir Colin Campbell, the English general from the Crimea; and then I went to the Latin Play by the scholars of Westminster School. So you see one can amuse oneself here, if not at Christmas, but beforehand.'

Towards the close of this year Renan wrote a sharp attack on Max Müller's Turanian article in Bunsen's Christianity and Mankind. The attack appeared in Renan's Histoire générale des langues sémitiques. Max Müller complained bitterly of the passage in a letter to Stanislas Julien, which he, with childlike innocence, showed to Renan, who wrote a long explanatory letter to Max Müller, in which he repeated the very point that was really the cause of offence, i. e. that in that essay Max had been under the influence of Bunsen, and had written it more to command than from conviction. Owing to the indiscretion of Stanislas Julien, the quarrel threatened to become serious, as Max Müller could not but feel that his honour as a writer had been called in question. He wrote a review of Renan's Grammaire Sémitique which amounted to a fierce attack upon the book. Bunsen wrote to Max Müller:—

Translation.

December 2, 1855.

'I send you these lines . . . to stop if possible your wrath against Renan. He confesses in his letter "Ma plume m'a trahi"; he has partly said what he thinks, and partly said what he does not think. . . . But his note is not that of an enemy. You must deal gently with him. You will do it, will you not, for my sake?'

Renan, too, wrote: 'Pardonnez-moi. Je n'ai pas compris ce que vous vouliez dire.' On this Max Müller suppressed the pamphlet, though already printed, and they gradually became great friends.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

December 25, 1855.

'... Your next work, God in History, will be a joy to read, for the beginning of the God-consciousness in the Veda has much occupied me of late, and has made me enter into depths of human consciousness hitherto unknown to me. The Veda alone of all works I know treats of a genesis of God-consciousness, compared to which the Theogony of Hesiod is like a worn-out creature. We see it grow slowly and gradually with all its contradictions, its sudden terrors, its amazements, and its triumphs. As God reveals His Being in nature, in her order, her wisdom, her indestructibility, in the eternal victory of light over darkness, of spring over winter, in the eternally returning course of the sun and the stars, so man has gradually spelt out of nature the Being of God, and after trying a thousand names for God in vain, we find him in the Veda already saying: They call Him Indra, Mitra, Varuna; then they call Him the Heavenly, the bird with beautiful wings;—that which is One they call in various ways; they call it Agni, Sama, Mâtârisvan. The belief in Immortality is only the other side as it were of the God-consciousness, and both are originally natural to the Aryan race. "As the sun sets, yet never dies, but returns," says the old Aryan, "neither shall I go into non-existence, but I shall live with the sun." The non-existence he denies as often as he can, and in the Veda the asat is the night of nature, which is nothing, though it frightens man and torments him, but just on account of that very thing makes him most sensitive to belief in and to hope of the ever-returning light. The Veda is inexhaustible, and the more I long to get to a close, the more I feel how much there remains still to be done, and yet I feel it a great blessing that such work has been given to me to do as the daily occupation of my life—and then everything seems to become indifferent, even if Monsieur Renan reviles me!

'In Oxford everything proceeds slowly but well. Liddell has been made Dean; he has a difficult position, but he is surely planted, and nobody will succeed in moving him away again. It is said that the Prince of Wales will be with him, but that may only be a report. Secondly, Jowett is established, and Pusey gets angry about him, and is sure to accuse him of heresy, and so secure him much greater influence. Pusey is very dangerous, and his influence is again on the increase. He seems to have designs on me, and I am on my guard. Then there is Thomson, Provost of Queen's, honest and friendly. Vaughan is also to come to Oxford. Brodie has been made Professor without signing the Articles, my own case preceding his, but he had a stronger case, being an Englishman. Everything was tried against him, even secret surprises at the voting, after making it known that no contest would take place. Everybody was afraid of a sudden attack at nightfall; the guards were called out, and the ambuscade found itself confronted by a picket which towered above them. Everything cannot go exactly as we wish, but the avalanche rolls in the right direction.

‘What a beautiful speech Prince Albert made in Birmingham! He ought not to show his cards too readily; he has to play the Brutus with the English, or else he will be treated as was Aristides. Excuse this long letter, but it is so rarely that one can speak to anybody about one's thoughts and feelings, that when I write to you my pen runs away with me.’

Bunsen later thanked Max Müller for his just, but sharply expressed and nobly suppressed, essay against Renan.

CHAPTER X

1856-1857

Comparative Mythology. Commemoration. His mother in England.
Volume III of Veda. Curator of Bodleian. Christmas at Glasgow.
Deutsche Liebe. Buddhist pilgrims. Examination at Exeter.
Visit to Froude. Germany. Manchester Exhibition.

IN the last days of the old year, Max Müller had found a house, 55, St. John's Street, and so hard did he work that he was settled before term began, as the notice of his lectures is dated from his new house. His course was on the 'History of the German Language, and its relation to Greek and Latin.' He writes to tell his mother how comfortably he is settled, and how much he hopes she will visit him in the summer, to see his home and life in England, though at the same time he cautions her not to expect much amusement, as he is far too busy to travel about with her, or give up much time to her, as he has daily work at the Bodleian, besides all his work at home. To Bunsen he writes :—

Translation.

55, ST. JOHN'S STREET, March 14.

'Everything progresses well in Oxford; it seems to me there is no other country in the world so pliable as England. At the right time we shall get everything in Oxford that we wished for, and the whole academical phraseology changes visibly. Of course Jowett is preached against every Sunday; it does not hurt him in the least, however, and he is occupied with a second edition<sup>1</sup>. The essay in the Quarterly is by Conybeare; I have not read it, for that sort of thing does not matter. When we grow older here in England we leave the talking and writing to others, and we occupy ourselves with the "doing"; and as I am now a member of Convocation and Congregation the committee-work and report-writing begin to occupy all my time. So I retire as much as possible and rejoice when something is really accomplished. It looks disgraceful in Prussia; the whole morality begins to be bankrupt.

<sup>1</sup> Commentary on the Thessalonians, &c.

'I am so glad to know that your great work<sup>1</sup> is to be concluded before the great war breaks out. I should have liked to send you my little contribution about the Veda, but Easter approaches, and till then I am actually glued to my table day after day, as I have promised Brockhaus, by contract, to hand over to him the MS. at the end of March. I am sending him a Vedic grammar as introduction to the first volume of the German edition of the Rig-veda. The text was printed some time ago, and therefore he presses me to send him the preface. So you see it is absolutely impossible to answer your questions now.

'The Flood-legend does not occur in the Hymns of the Veda, but in the Brâhmanas. Burnouf considers it borrowed, and he may be right, as it only occurs in a modern Brâhmana. The Fall is hinted at, not morally but only metaphysically. . . . The keynote which runs through the whole always is: We do not know; who looked on when God made the world? To whom did he mention it? I mean to stay here for the summer, and expect my mother to pay me a visit.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, March 23.

'You must lead a very quiet life, and not anger and excite yourself. The things that annoy us in life are after all very trifling things, if we always bear in mind for what purpose we are here. And even in the heavier trials, one knows, or one should know, that all is sent by a higher Power, and in the end must be for our best interests. It is true we cannot understand it, but we can understand that God rules in the world in the smallest and in the largest events, and he who keeps that ever in mind has the peace of God, and enjoys his life as long as it lasts. I am sure that a quiet, contented mind is better than all medicine and Carlsbad. I dare say a change of air will be good for you, and life in England is very healthy, if you will live quietly. We cannot travel about much, for it is too expensive and requires younger legs, but Oxford itself is sure to please you, and you will see what my life here is.'

This spring Max Müller's article on Comparative Mythology appeared in the Oxford Essays. It has been reprinted in both editions of the Chips. A contemporary writer speaks of the 'great impression made by Max Müller's essay on <sup>1</sup> Egypt.

Comparative Mythology, published in the Oxford Essays, in which he applied the rules of comparative philology to the elucidation of Aryan myths, in a manner at once scientific and popular.' 'Max Müller,' says Professor Macdonell in his obituary notice in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society,

'was a pioneer in this country of the Science of Comparative Mythology, founded by Adalbert Kuhn. . . . Beginning with his essay on Comparative Mythology, which appeared in 1856, he wrote a number of papers on mythological subjects. . . . His mythological method, based on linguistic equations, has but few adherents in the present day, for most of his identifications . . . have been rejected owing to the more stringent application of phonetic laws which now prevails in Comparative Philology. . . . Nevertheless, his writings have proved valuable in this field also by stimulating mythological investigations even beyond the range of Aryan-speaking nations.'

Of this essay a friend wrote many years later to Max Müller:—

'When I was young I remember you were my ideal hero—the magician who admitted me into a gorgeous fairy-land. I can remember as if it were yesterday, in the early sixties, how I read the Oxford essay in the British Museum, and walked home to Clapham westward facing a glorious sunset, hardly conscious that I was a creature of this planet! And later on a new book of yours was an event in my life!'

Bunsen was busying himself at this time with questions of Indian chronology, in which Max Müller could not sympathize, feeling the ground too insecure for any real historical treatment. In one letter he says:—

Translation.

April, 1856.

'I only recognize one chronology for India, the four literary periods of the Veda, which bring us to at least 1500 B. C., and even at that time show us a formulated system of divinities and even priest-craft. Before this time the schism of Brāhmans and Zoroastrians had taken place. And long before this, even, the schism between the Aryans tracking north-eastward and those tracking southwards took place; and before the nomadic Greeks separated from the nomadic Indians, centuries must have passed. There seems no doubt that the South Aryans (later on divided into Indians and Zoroastrians) had settled together in Bactria. . . . The alphabet on the Aryan coins in the north of India is no doubt Semitic. The Sanskrit alphabet has its origin from elsewhere, and I believe I shall be able to trace it to the Himyaritic. When it reached India is the great question, and that I am unable to answer. "Ophir" proves how old the commerce between India and Phoenicia must have been; for "Ophir" is Abhîva on the Indus. So you see the oldest date of the name Ophir occurring in the Bible is the latest time in which the Aryans were already settled by the sea, and at the time of the Veda they had not yet settled there. Could it be proved that Solomon knew the name Ophir, it would of course be a terminus a quo. His lion-throne made of ivory reminds one of the Sanskrit lion-seat, i.e. throne. Lassen has established the Sanskrit etymology of the products of Ophir. I am now printing my old Vedic grammar—just think that 400 B.C. each syllable of the Rig-veda had been counted, each lengthened syllable had been carefully marked, and each metrical inaccuracy had been carefully registered. But it is an awful work, and I long to return to my mythology.'

This letter crossed one from Bunsen, in which he tells Max Müller, 'It would be a great pleasure to you, my dear friend, if you could see the enthusiasm of my reawakened love for India, which possessed me in 1811-4, and which now daily overpowers me.' The letter ends, 'Send me a letter, only without "Your Excellency."' I beg you will always write to me as friend to friend.'

To this friendly invitation Max Müller replies:—

Translation. 55, ST. JOHN STREET, OXFORD, April 25, 1856.

'YOUR EXCELLENCY,—Allow me to continue to call you so; it is an old habit, and reminds me of the time when first I entered your study to have my passport to Germany visé'd, in a despairing mood as I was then, without an aim, without means to carry out the one scheme which I had clearly planned for myself! How much has happened since then! Oh, when I think how I have to thank you, your encouragement, your sympathy, for the whole turn of my fate, if I consider that, I know of no other word which would better express my veneration for you, my love and my gratitude, than the one by which I addressed you with German awkwardness at the first visit I paid you, a word which, like many another one, has been much misused, but has nevertheless not yet lost its true meaning!

'With regard to Megasthenes<sup>1</sup>, I do not know how I can help you. As far as I have occupied myself with the chronological question, which has never been a passion with me, I do not see in the least how Megasthenes could know more than Wilford or Sir W. Jones. Megasthenes could not know anything but what we know, for though we know nothing of Indian history, we know the history of Indian literature sufficiently well to be able to ascertain that no annals have ever been lost, simply because none ever existed. We have the most distinct traces in the Rig-veda of the schism between the Brâhmins and the followers of the Zend-Avesta.

<sup>1</sup> Greek envoy from Seleucus Nicator (306-298 B.C.) to Chandra-gupta (Sandrocottus). He wrote a work on India.

'I intend very soon to publish something about this, perhaps in the Long Vacation, when Mrs. Liddell, &c., will have no more music parties, when there are no more examinations in London and no more lectures in Oxford, and when the third volume of the Veda has been published. Now I feel so hunted that I can accomplish nothing. I have so many claims on my time during term, that I often have to do the most necessary work in the middle of the night. Froude's History is out; I have devoured the first volume, and have put the second on one side for later on. It seems to me very good. Jowett has not yet been burnt; instead of that he thinks of publishing Plato's Republic. Examinations, education, are the ordre du jour; in a very short time all positions will be open for competition. What a social revolution that is! It would have drawn blood in other lands. Much of it is due to Trevelyan. Gladstone made a manful speech last night—how much that means. Ever yours.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, May 6.

'I have been in London again for a week and have made many interesting acquaintances. Life in England is so grand, and I wish you could see me at such a dinner as lately at Lord Denbigh's—such pictures all round the room! I am in no want of work to do, and with all the interruptions here, I can hardly get on. . . . I hear occasionally from Bunsen. I do not believe he means to return to England. As to your journey here, you must inquire whether any acquaintances are coming to England. I shall certainly stay in Oxford this summer, as I have a good deal of work before me. Oxford in summer during the vacation is delightful. In a fortnight I must go again to London. I shall be staying with friends in one of the best houses—very pleasant, and cheap. Then I shall hear Jenny Lind, and in a month she is coming to Oxford to give two concerts, and we shall have grand festivities; Peace festival, &c.'

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, OXFORD, May 4, 1856.

'YOUR EXCELLENCY,—Your last letter awaited me in Oxford, as I spent all last week in London to examine there. The more I see how deeply you penetrate into Indian chronology, the more I regret that I cannot follow you as I did formerly. It would indeed be a great work if you could find a secure historical foundation for the Indian traditions. I am still at the previous question—i.e. Could Megasthenes make any discovery besides that which we have made from Sanskrit literature? This question must be answered, and there I am afraid Megasthenes with his total ignorance of Sanskrit will have the worst of it, as compared with Manetho and his knowledge of hieroglyphics, and Berosus with his knowledge of cuneiform. However, I am ignorant, and therefore unprejudiced, and I am willing to learn and to believe. My passion is now Mythology; and I see you cannot serve two masters, for at present I cannot get away from it, though so many other things claim my attention. I long for the Long Vacation, and I expect a visit from my mother, and therefore I shall not go to Germany. I hope to write something more about Mythology. I find that John Bull has taken a bite and asks for more. At present I am working at my grammar, and I am also working at a German Historical Reader, which I could not refuse on account of my Professorship. Forgive me, therefore, that I do not throw myself into Indian chronology, but I can do nothing unless I can do it with all my heart. Confident of your kind indulgence, I always remain, much honoured friend, master and benefactor, your faithful M.M.’

In April of this year Max Müller had again met his future wife, and during six weeks they saw each other constantly at her home, and in London, and at the Grand Commemoration and Peace festivities in Oxford; little foreseeing the painful three years of total silence and separation that they had to go through before their marriage was allowed. In the first days of July Max’s mother arrived, accompanied by Emilie von Stolzenberg, and the faithful family friend Baron Hagedorn. They spent two or three weeks in London, seeing all the sights, going to the Opera, dining at Richmond. The mother, cousin, and Hagedorn went from London to the Isle of Wight without Max, who returned to Oxford. After the visit to the Isle of Wight, Hagedorn returned to Germany, the mother and cousin going to Oxford. From there the Baroness visited Scotland, and the whole party then returned to London, and devoted themselves to sight-seeing, till Emilie went to Germany towards the end of August, leaving the mother to enjoy her son to herself for two months longer.

On July 17 Bunsen writes to congratulate Max Müller on the visit of his mother and cousin:—

Translation.

‘You know it was a letter of the latter which first told me of you, and made me wish to see you. And then you came yourself, and all that I prophesied of you after the first conversation in London, and your first visit to us in the country, has been richly fulfilled—yes, beyond my boldest hopes. You have won an honourable position in the first English University, not only for yourself, but for the Fatherland, and you have richly returned the love which I felt for you from the first moment, and have faithfully reciprocated a friendship which constitutes an essential portion of my happiness.’

On August 25 Max Müller sent his usual birthday congratulations to Bunsen. It must be remembered that birthdays are much more observed in Germany than in England, hence the constant references in Max Müller’s letters to his own birthday or those of his mother and sister. In after-years the birthdays in his own home circle were specially marked and joyful days.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation. 55, ST. JOHN STREET, OXFORD, August 25, 1856.

‘I have thought of you with much feeling to-day, and send forth my hearty congratulations, as I think of the beautiful old age, vigorous in mind and body, with which Heaven has blest you. May this day return many a time, and find you surrounded by all dear to you; and may your life, perfect as it has been, be a pattern and comfort to the world at large. I am looking forward to the concluding part of Egypt, especially to the mythological part of it. I can well imagine that you have found a more comprehensive form of mythological consciousness. I had only just knocked at the door with my essay. I intended to prove that the mythical form was unavoidable. In the great regions of God-consciousness we ourselves still think and feel mythically, that is, language runs away with our thoughts. My essay has called forth some opposition, which makes me glad; for I thought the matter so evident, that nothing further could be said about it; instead of which I perceive that not only has a hole to be made through the wall, but that the whole wall has to be pulled down and each barricade to be got rid of. Whether I shall be able to do this is doubtful, for with all my love for antiquity and the past, my dreams for the future return again and again, and I feel somewhat drawn to India—a desire difficult to resist in the end. Only I do not know how to get there ; but my life here seems so aimless and unfruitful that I shall not be able to bear it for very much longer. I thought the other day whether I could not manage to go to India with the Maharajah Dhulip Singh. He is very well spoken of, and he returns next year after having learnt in England what good things he may do some day for his Fatherland in India. It seems to me it would form the natural nucleus of a small Indo-Christian colony, and it is only necessary to create such a centre in order to exercise one's power of attraction on all sides. After the last annexation the territorial conquest of India ceases—what follows next is the struggle in the realm of religion and of spirit, in which, of course, centres the interests of the nations. India is much riper for Christianity than Rome or Greece were at the time of St. Paul. The rotten tree has for some time had artificial supports, because its fall would have been inconvenient for the Government. But if the Englishman comes to see that the tree must fall, sooner or later, then the thing is done, and he will mind no sacrifice either of blood or of land. For the good of this struggle I should like to lay down my life, or at least to lend my hand to bring about this struggle. Dhulip Singh is much at Court, and is evidently destined to play a political part in India. I wish I could get in touch with him in some quite natural way. Could it be managed with the help of Prince Albert, or would you help me to it? I do not at all like to go to India as a missionary, that makes one dependent on the parsons ; nor do I care to go as a Civil Servant, as that would make me dependent on the Government. I should like to live for ten years quite quietly and learn the language, try to make friends, and then see whether I was fit to take part in a work, by means of which the old mischief of Indian priestcraft could be overthrown and the way opened for the entrance of simple Christian teaching, that entrance which this teaching finds into every human heart, which is freed from the ensnaring powers of priests and from the obscuring influence of philosophers. Whatever finds root in India soon overshadows the whole of Asia, and nowhere could the vital power of Christianity more gloriously realize itself than if the world saw it spring up there for a second time, in a very different form from that in the West, but still essentially the same.

‘Much more could be said about this ; a wide world opens before one, for which it is well worth while to give one's life. And what is to be done here ? here in England ? here in Oxford ?—nothing but to help polish up a few ornaments on a cathedral which is rotten at the base. But enough for to-day ! My mother and my cousin have been with me for about eight weeks, and some other friends. With the exception of my mother, who is going to stay on with me, they left a few days ago, and I have set to work again ; my work was interrupted for so long. I long for Germany ; and how I should like to come to you to Heidelberg, but that is impossible this year, and next year I hope to see you in England. In faithful friendship, yours.'

The poor mother who in her Diary speaks of the quiet time in Oxford alone with her son as 'unclouded happiness,' had little idea of all these thoughts poured out to his fatherly friend !

Meantime the third volume of the Rig-veda had been published, the last volume that was brought out under the auspices of the old East India Company, and dedicated to them. There had been in the previous year some doubt whether it would be possible to finish this great work. The first calculation of the extent of the work, and therefore of its cost, had been based on defective MSS., consequently when the third volume was ready for printing, it was found that this only completed half of the work, whilst exhausting a great deal more than half of the money voted for the whole, and it was with some difficulty and after many anxious months that, owing to the influence which Professor Wilson possessed over the Board of Directors, the additional funds were voted. The preface to this volume therefore ends with an expression of the editor's gratitude to the Directors 'for having sanctioned the continuation of the work and granted funds necessary for its completion ; an act of enlightened liberality which will be applauded by all persons interested in the history of India, and in the history of mankind, and by which one of the most important monuments of antiquity will be rescued from oblivion and restored in its integrity.' Max Müller was able in his preface to speak of the growing interest the work was exciting among scholars, as being—

'found to shed the most unexpected light on the darkest periods in the history of the most prominent nations of antiquity. Thus, though not yet known in its completeness, the Veda has assumed an importance which no other literary production of India could ever have claimed ; and we may rest convinced that as long as a man cherishes the records of his family, in the widest sense of the word, these simple songs will maintain their place among the most natural annals of ancient history. One class of readers may have been disappointed [in the Veda] : men who study ancient literature less on account of its historical than its practical value. But the true historian values facts ancient and genuine, and a corroded copper As of the Roman Republic is of greater value to him than an imperial gold medal of the most exquisite workmanship. . . . I must confess that I could have wished that the ancient poets of the Veda and their Indian commentators had been less diffuse; for though I believe that no edition of any author in Sanskrit, or any other language, for which MSS. had first to be copied, others to be collated, innumerable references to be verified, and an index to be made of every word, has ever been brought out so rapidly as this edition of the Rig-veda; yet I feel that ten years of my life are gone, and I know not whether I shall have sufficient time left to finish a work which I once undertook perhaps with too much confidence. Yet even if I should not see the completion of this work, I should not be sorry for the time I have spent on it; and nothing will ever induce me to change the principles which I have hitherto followed, and to give a hasty copy of a MS. instead of a critical edition of the text and commentary of the Rig-veda.'

Max Müller again acknowledges the valuable assistance of his learned friend Dr. Aufrecht, and his sincere 'regret that he should no longer<sup>1</sup> enjoy this advantage, as much of the correctness and accuracy of the last volumes was due to his conscientious co-operation.'

The lectures this term were on 'The History of German Civilization and Literature, from the earliest times to the reign of Charlemagne.'

On October 30 Max parted with his mother, who left under care of a friend, going by boat from London to Antwerp, and so to Chemnitz to her daughter.

That afternoon Max writes to his mother:—

Translation.

'Our happy time is over, and the winter will not bring me much pleasure. But I beg you to enjoy your time in Chemnitz, . . . and you must tell them how happy we have been here together. I cannot thank God enough for the happiness that I had in your visit, even if I did not talk much about it. You know that one feels most when one says least.'

In several of his letters to Bunsen, Max Müller refers to Mr. Jowett, whose orthodoxy was at this time suspected by many of the leading people in Oxford, and his intimacy with whom brought Max himself into ill odour with several of his more narrow-minded friends. He received early in the autumn a letter from a friend whose good opinion and affection he highly valued—a letter questioning the orthodoxy of his religious views. He answered it thus:—

<sup>1</sup> See p. 164.

To —.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, October 4, 1856.

‘Your letter has been in my hands for some time, and I have thought about it many times, and I have tried to make it clear to myself why you should have written that letter—but at last I felt convinced that, though you must have known that it would give me much pain, you wrote it from the kindest motives, and with that anxiety which we feel for a friend only. I see clearly that in your own heart you do not believe the charge which somebody unknown to me has brought against me. For if you did, you would not have written to me, you would not have asked me. For how can I defend myself against such a charge, except by telling you it is not true, and if you believe in me, do not believe it? If I have said or written anything that has given offence to your friend, let me know it, and I shall then be able to defend myself. But if some one, without giving any proof, without giving even his name, tells you that I am an unbeliever, that I do not believe in the Bible, that I do not believe in Christ our Lord and Saviour, I need not fear him. I know that there are not a few who treat our faith as such a light matter that they think nothing of charging a man with infidelity, though they would shrink from charging him with dishonesty. And some of them are honourable men, who act from pure and high motives, and whose only fault is too much confidence in themselves and too little confidence in others. But, I say again, I need not fear them. I have many friends who know me, and know my religious convictions; and though I have always avoided theological controversy, I have never avoided expressing my faith in the doctrines of Christianity, when I felt called upon to do so. I am not a theologian, and though I have been occupied for many years with the study of the ancient forms of religion, and though I have followed with a deep interest the history of our own Church from the earliest times, I do not feel competent to lay down the law, or even to express an opinion on all points, where even the best and wisest have stumbled, because they endeavoured to fathom with their human reason the depths of a Divine mystery. If you read the history of the Church, you will find that this has been the source of all heresy, and that all divisions and persecutions in the Church have arisen from the attempts of theologians to substitute their own thoughts and their own expressions for the simple language in which Christianity has been revealed to us in the Bible. And if we know the dangers of religious controversy, if we see how it is opposed to the very spirit of Christianity, how it appeals to the worst passions and destroys every feeling of charity, we ought to pity the priest or theologian who, like a physician, must enter into this pest-house; but surely we have a right to refuse to follow him, and to be dragged into it against our will. And if he tells us that we are ourselves infected with heresy, it is a serious charge indeed, but we may appeal to our friends and to a higher tribunal, and we may at least remind our accuser of one of the last commandments; nay, we may tell him that at a time when Christianity was a crime, Roman Emperors who had no scruple in making martyrs of all who professed the name of Christ, thought it fair to pass a law by which informers who could not substantiate their charge of Christianity against a Roman citizen were liable to a severe, even capital, punishment. I must say no more, for I do not wish to offend you by saying anything harsh against one who is your friend, and who may have been induced by a feeling of kindness towards you to disregard a duty which, as Christians, we owe to all men, even to a mere stranger. . . . Whatever our hearts may feel, and whatever our fleeting passions may say against it, there is no true, no lasting love, unless it has its source and life in God. . . . Through my whole life I have learnt this one lesson, that nothing can happen to us unless it be the will of God, and this I believe now more than ever. My life has been a happy one, and seeing that all I wanted, and much more, was given me, I began to think that there could be no disappointment in life. I have learnt better, and yet I feel again that there can be no disappointment in life, if we but learn to submit our will to the will of God. . . . We ought to remember also that our faith is not our faith, but that, like everything else, it is given us. Therefore we should not glory in our faith, or look down upon others whom we think poor in faith, or who may seem to differ from us. Let us wait for a little while—and to those whose eyes are turned to God and eternity the longest life is but a little while—let us wait then in faith, hope, and charity; these three abide, but the greatest of these is charity.'

Soon after his mother had left him, Max Müller was cheered by a visit from his old friend Fontane, who had been wandering about England, collecting materials for two works which he afterwards published under the titles, England, Studies in English Art, &c., and Beyond the Tweed. Fontane writes of this visit:—

Translation.

'In the autumn of 1856 I paid a visit to Müller. I wanted to see the "heart of England," the midland counties, . . . and Oxford was to be my first halting-place. I was with him for two days, and count these days among the pleasantest in my memory, for the sake of Müller and the place itself. I have seen a large number of the cities of Western Europe, but none have made so powerful, so enchanting an impression on me. It is difficult to say in what the superiority of Oxford consists. It is not merely its architecture. . . . But in a peculiar mingling . . . of beautiful architecture, beautiful landscape, and rich historical recollections it stands alone. Since the day I left Oxford I have not seen Müller again in England.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

*Translation.*LONDON, December 6.

'I cannot write much to-day, as I am not quietly at home, but am staying with Walrond, and I have but a minute to tell you that I have entered my new year well, and of good courage. God has helped me hitherto, and will surely further help me and all of us, and whatever happens to us is always the best for us, even if we do not at once understand and perceive it.'

Max Müller was appointed a Curator of the Bodleian in this year, and always took great interest in the Curators' meetings. He was a keen advocate for more liberal arrangements in lending out MSS. under proper precautions, a privilege accorded by so many of the leading foreign libraries.

Christmas was spent at Calder Park, near Glasgow, with the parents of his friend Walrond. Max Müller writes from there to thank his mother for her beautiful Christmas gift, the fine bust of Goethe, which his friends will remember always stood on the top of the bookcase opposite the writing-table at which he spent so many hours of his life, and he would often look up at it as if to imbibe fresh courage for his work from the strong and noble features of the mighty master.

The year 1857 was devoted by Max Müller to the Rig-veda, and to the preparation of his German Classics. He was far from well the whole year, and out of spirits, and though forced to enter into society by his many kind friends, it is evident from his Diary, resumed this year, that it was mere weariness to him, and he buried himself as much as possible in his work. The correspondence with Bunsen was not very constant, and his general correspondence not as voluminous as usual throughout this year.

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, January 24, 1857.

'I have through this week been in such constant intercourse with you, have heard and learnt so much from you, and have so often thought of the happy time when your real presence made a home for me in a strange land, that although I have nothing to tell you, or to complain of, I must at least thank you for the mental enjoyment your book God in History has brought me. Your book is a fact, and as such must produce an effect, if there is any life left in mankind, if the retrospective look does not blind the spirit, and the eyes of the present generation are not obstinately closed to all glimpses into the future. You have said afresh what is old, unveiled what is hidden, and made dead things live. You have placed the Bible within the focus of history, so that men can perceive its real greatness, whilst to most people this book stands so close they cannot see it, or so far they cannot reach it. I can form no judgement on many single points, and I am glad of this for the present, as the whole has therefore a greater effect on me. But if I find that my strength lasts out, I too must enter on this study, when my other work is finished, which I have undertaken, and must carry out. But in that too lies many a problem, which must be solved, and I cannot reconcile it to myself, to draw the limits of God-inspired mankind so narrowly as you do in many passages in your last work. The men in India were not forsaken by God, and if we cannot join in their prayers, the fault is ours. The heart is too narrow, the spirit too proud. I do not yet despair of discovering the chord by which the dissonance of the Veda and Zend-Avesta and the Chinese Kings will be brought into unison with the key-note of the Bible. There can be nothing accidental, nothing inharmonious on earth and in history; the unresolved discords in the East must find their solution, and we dare not leave off till we have discovered the why and the wherefore. You will come to treat of this in your second volume, where the Greek dissonance resolves itself in the Apostle of the Gentiles, and it is a pity your completed work has not appeared at once. This must at all events be the case in England. I had already read the book before I received the copy you have yourself sent me, and for which I send my warmest thanks. Of my useless life here I have nothing to tell you. I am weary and worn out, perhaps things may yet go better. I remain, in true affection and gratitude, yours ever,

'M. M.'

To this his fatherly friend replied:—

Translation.

January 29.

‘I am not at all easy at what you tell me about yourself and your feelings. But why are you unhappy? You have gained for yourself a delightful position in life. You are getting on with your gigantic work. You (like me) have won a Fatherland in England without losing your German home, the ever excellent. You have a beautiful future before you. You can at any moment give yourself a comfortable and soul-satisfying family circle. If many around you are philistines, you know that already; still they are worth something in their own line. Only step boldly forward into life.’

Max Müller seems to have given more time again to music this year, and he tells his mother early in February, ‘The two Miss Jelfs are here, and we have had a great deal of music, and have studied and sung Mendelssohn’s Forty-second Psalm with chorus. It went very well, but I had a good deal to do in practising the choir. We were sixteen voices.’ Mrs. Thomson<sup>1</sup> writes of these parties:—

‘Your husband kindly conducted my concerts in the Hall at Queen’s, where we got up the Lobgesang and the Forty-second Psalm by Mendelssohn, sung by amateurs. Thanks to his kindness, they were a very great success, and sounded so well in the Hall, which was furnished as a drawing-room, with palms and sofas and rugs. He seemed much pleased with the result.’

There is a photograph taken by Professor Maskelyne and Dr. Thomson of Max Müller and several members of his choir; all gone now, except Mrs. Thomson and one other friend. Max Müller tells us in the Autobiography that Mendelssohn’s music was still despised by some of the old school, and that one evening Dr. Elwes, the old organist of New College, who had been listening to the Hymn of Praise, ‘walked up to me—to thank me, as I thought—but no, he burst out into a torrent of real and somewhat coarse abuse of me for venturing to introduce such flimsy music into Oxford.’

It was in the February of this year that Deutsche Liebe was published by Brockhaus in Leipzig. It had been written in the autumn, whilst Max Müller’s mother was still with him. So much has been written and said about this prose idyll, so many people have declared it to be autobiographical, that it is perhaps well once for all to say that it is pure fiction as far as the characters and circumstances are concerned. It was written as a relief to his own feelings, and Max Müller thought by making an invalid princess the object of those feelings no one would easily guess the author, or the reason why it was written. That the Schloss and scenery described resemble Dessau was but natural, seeing how little else Max had seen in his own country. The book came out anonymously, and for two or three editions the secret was well kept. Only to Bunsen did Max Müller acknowledge himself as author. Of his English friends, Froude alone from the first guessed the authorship, and in a review of the book in the Saturday Review says:—

<sup>1</sup> Her husband was then Provost of Queen’s.

‘One of our first impulses on seeing the general character of this work was to turn to the “Bekenntnisse einer schönen Seele” in Wilhelm Meister, and to refresh our recollection of that remarkable production. It was not without feelings of satisfaction that we laid down the volume of the great master and took up the one before us, reflecting how much half a century had done to elevate and purify the tone of society. . . . It is due to the author to say that it is truly gratifying to find, in a book which touches at so many points on the domain of religion, not one expression which can offend, in the slightest degree, any reasonable and right-minded person.’

The book is now in its twelfth edition in Germany, where after forty-five years it still commands a steady sale, whilst an unauthorized translation in America, under the title of Memories, has had an enormous circulation, and continues to be a general favourite there. Miss Winkworth published a translation in English as soon as the book appeared, by leave of the publisher, and twenty years later Max Müller brought out a translation by his wife, made many years previously, which has been through several editions. One review spoke of Deutsche Liebe as a book ‘full of tender grace, touching sympathy, noble compassion, impressing love. With a delicate hand the author places before us the deeper depths of a true soul. It is a humanizing, refining, chastening volume, and is worthy of the widest circulation.’ Another paper says: ‘These recollections touch with much delicacy of feeling upon some of the most sacred emotions and hopes. Whoever the original author or authors may be, the papers reveal a very deep and sympathetic insight into man's nature; and many notable things are said of happiness, love, loss, gain, and suffering, as they constantly affect and impinge upon the human soul.' It was pronounced by Bunsen to be one of the most perfect specimens of German writing he had ever read.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

February 24, 1857.

'I wanted a short time ago to send you a book, written by a very intimate friend of mine, and published by Brockhaus. It is called Deutsche Liebe. The author does not wish his name to be known. If you have any spare money, buy a copy, and tell me how you like it, but do not tell any one that I know the author. I was very sorry to hear of Krüger's<sup>1</sup> death, though I never really saw much of him. He lived in quite another world, and his art did not appeal much to me. But he had won a good position by his work alone, and that was greatly to his credit, and one always rejoices when merit like his is recognized by a man's contemporaries. I wish I had a picture of you by him. Find out how much a good oil picture costs in Dresden, but it must be good, by Hübner or some other good artist.'

Max Müller's course of lectures this term was on 'Epic Poetry.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

LONDON, March 26.

'I was not at all well: bad colds and toothache had made me quite ill, and I needed a change and amusement. I am staying with Walrond, you know where that is, and I visit old friends. I hoped to find Morier, but he has not yet arrived, though he has left Vienna. I must tell you, and Emilie also, that I am quite innocent as to Deutsche Liebe. I know the author, but have promised not to mention his name, as he makes a point of it. He only published the book because he thought that here and there it might do some good, and might cure young people of the epidemic of so-called unfortunate love. The book contains the antidote to Werther's Leiden, and in so far is interesting; but it ought to have been more fully worked out to have much influence. I entirely agree with the spirit of the book, and am glad you like it. I do not care much for the plan of the story; it is too sketchy, and is wanting in repose and unity.'

It was in the Times of April 17 and 20 of this year that a review appeared by Max Müller of Stanislas Julien's Voyages des Pèlerins Bouddhistes. It was afterwards published as a pamphlet, together with a letter on Nirvâna called forth by a protest printed in the Times of April 24, against Max Müller's view of Nirvâna as utter annihilation, whereas the writer of the protest maintained that Nirvâna meant union and communion with God. Max Müller's opponent appealed to the works of Mander and Creuzer, who were neither of them Oriental scholars, and who wrote before the canonical books of the Buddhists had been brought to Europe. In his answer Max explains the etymology of the word, which means blowing out. 'The human soul, when it arrives at its perfection, is blown out, like a lamp, as the Buddhists say, not absorbed, as the Brâhmans say, like a drop in the ocean.' He shows also 'that Nirvâna, as taught in the metaphysics of Kâsyapa, a friend and pupil of Buddha himself, is annihilation, and there is no earlier document from which we can form an opinion as to Buddha's original teaching.' 'Buddhism, therefore, if tested by its own canonical books, cannot be freed from the charge of Nihilism, whatever may have been its character in the mind of its founder, and whatever changes it may have undergone in later times, and among races less inured to metaphysical discussions than the Hindus.' 'Buddha himself, however, though perhaps not a Nihilist, was certainly an Atheist. He does not deny distinctly either the existence of gods, or that of God; but he ignores the former, and is ignorant of the latter. Therefore if Nirvâna in his mind was not yet complete annihilation, still less could it have been absorption into a Divine Essence.' In 1869 Max Müller gave an address at Kiel on Buddhist Nihilism, before the Association of German Philologists, in which these words occur: 'No person who reads with attention the metaphysical speculations on the Nirvâna contained in the Buddhist Canon, can arrive at any other conviction than that expressed by Burnouf, i. e. that Nirvâna, the highest aim, the summum bonum of Buddhism, is the absolute nothing.' Those among Max Müller's friends who know his own strong convictions as to the immortality of the soul, may perhaps feel surprised at the increasing interest he took in Buddhism as years went on. For at Kiel he declared, 'Buddhist Nihilism has always been much more incomprehensible than Atheism. A kind of religion is still conceivable, when there is something firm somewhere, when a something eternal and self-dependent is recognized, if not without and above man, at least within him. But if, as Buddhism teaches, the soul after having passed through all the phases of existence, all the worlds of the gods and the higher spirits, attains finally Nirvâna as its highest aim and last reward, i. e. becomes quite extinct, then religion is not any more what it ought to be—a bridge from the finite to the infinite, but a trap-bridge hurling man into the abyss, at the very moment when he thought he had arrived at the stronghold of the Eternal.' But even from his address at Kiel, it may be gathered that by that time Max Müller had convinced himself that the third part of the Buddhist Canon, in which alone the doctrine of Nirvâna in its crude form is to be found, was not 'pronounced by Buddha,' and that passages are to be found in the first and second parts of the Canon which contradict this crude Nihilism. Max Müller asks pertinently, 'Where Buddha speaks of Nirvâna as the highest happiness, can he mean annihilation?' It was when preparing a translation of the Dhammapada in 1870, afterwards revised and published as Volume X of the Sacred Books of the East, that the extreme moral beauty of Buddha's teaching powerfully attracted Max Müller's sympathy for Buddhism, and this was further increased when two years later he came in contact with living Buddhists, his pupils Bunyiu Nanjio and Kenjiu Kasawara, and still later Professor Takakusu, and saw the purity of their character, their true and gentle dispositions, and entire devotion to duty. The article on Stanislas Julien's book was almost Max Müller's first introduction to Buddhism. Pâli he had studied at Berlin.

<sup>1</sup> The artist.

After several months of silence Max Müller writes again to his old friend Chevalier Bunsen :—

Translation.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, May 1.

'One may fight against physical illness, though it is difficult with persistent colds, which attack the head to-day, the teeth to-morrow, to keep up one's good-natured warmth and communicativeness; but if the cold once takes possession of the mind and the spirits, it is really the best thing to shut oneself up for a time. I have felt like this this winter. I felt I was not myself, and I did not wish to be a burden to others with my worries and blue devils. You will laugh at me and scold me, for no one has any sympathy with mental illness till it takes the worst form. But I can assure you that I have suffered a great deal, and am still suffering in spite of the approach of spring. I cannot sympathize with the fancy of most people always to appear happy. But when I feel miserable, I will at all events not be a burden to others, and so I shut myself up, and write no letters. So forgive my long silence, and have patience with me, who have so much that I must bear patiently. I received the three volumes of Egypt but recently, and I cannot find that you wrote to me that you wished for any supplement or remarks for your English edition. I have read your work here and there, and have followed with great delight your Herculean labours in the Augean stable of Indian history. But as my present work lies in quite a different direction, I have postponed the careful reading of your book to Long Vacation, and hope then to be able to say something more definite about it. It will interest you to find in the journal of the Chinese traveller Hiouen-thsang, therefore in the seventh century A.D., quotations in several places from native Indian historical works, of which we till now knew nothing, and whose existence even in the seventh century appeared to me till now very problematical. The work is full of interest, and I have written a long review on it in the Times of April 17 and 20. I have also given there the translation of a Vedic hymn, which would interest you. I have had to give up and waste my time lately on German literature. The University raised my salary, and I felt I must work for it, and so I am printing a chronologically arranged Reading Book, extracted from Wackernagel, &c. It is a sad waste of my time, for I could do better and more important work, but I cannot help myself. . . . I consider Roth's conception of Yama as entirely mistaken. Yama is the setting, dying sun, thus the Beyond, the eternal life, or personified, the Lord of those who are gone, of the kingdom of death. What we call death was to the Hindus always a passage; later they called it a setting free, a word that suits us better than death. . . . You are really unjust to Froude. Even if his idea of Henry VIII is mistaken, his picture of English life is not affected by that. There are chapters in his work that are really masterly—the Irish rebellion, the Charterhouse monks; and he has described the secret workings of the Reformation among the common people with genuine feeling and sympathy. Froude's idea of Henry VIII seems to me too problematical. But at all events Henry was one of the most popular of kings, and has his admirers not only in Froude but in his people, and in such historians as Sharon Turner, and such philosophers as Carlyle. I have a great affection for Froude, for I know him with all his faults, and know that he prays and works. Kingsley is a more brilliant nature, but his relation to Froude has never been that of a teacher; on the contrary, that of an admirer. Le roman ne vaut pas l'histoire. How people came to look on the Saturday as Kingsley's and my organ I cannot imagine. I met the editor once in London, and have sent him a few articles. The paper is politically in the hands of decayed Peelites; in literature it is independent and active. I remember one gross attack on you in the political part of the paper, but I should have felt it unworthy of your name to take any notice of such an attack. Woe to the man who has no enemies in England—you will never want for them, but they help far more than they hurt. I have to fight my way bravely, and here in Oxford the battle never ceases. I sit on the same board with Pusey, and know the man. He will soon attack me, but I am armed. Stanley is now coming to Oxford. Liddell is better, and comes back next month from Madeira. Jowett is indefatigable, and they have not conquered him. He is printing his second edition<sup>1</sup>. Vaughan is married, and comes very seldom to Oxford. Pattison is as reserved as ever, and trusts no one. It is a deep secret that he writes the article in the Westminster<sup>2</sup>. I live chiefly alone, and see no one but Jowett. My mother left me in October. She was not strong enough to stand an English November; but I hope to have her here again this summer. And now I have written really too much, and must again beg you to have patience with a poor melancholy invalid. Begging you to remember me most heartily to all your party, I remain as ever, yours in true reverence and devotion.'

With this letter Max Müller sent his pamphlet on Buddhist Pilgrims to Bunsen.

On May 8 Bunsen writes:—

Translation.

'I must thank you, and express my delight at your letter and article. The letter confirms my fears in the highest degree, namely that you are not well, not to say that you begin to be a hypochondriacal old bachelor. But that is such a natural consequence of your retired sulky Don's life, and of your spleen, that I can only wonder how you fight so bravely against it. . . . You will soon see how nearly we agree together, although I cannot say so much of the humanizing influence of Buddhism. . . . You have represented the whole as with a magic wand. We really edified ourselves yesterday evening with it, Francis read aloud and we listened.'

<sup>1</sup> Commentary on Thessalonians.

<sup>2</sup> On Bunsen's God in History.

This term Max Müller read the Nibelungen with his class.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, May 24.

'How beautiful it must be in Carlsbad . . . how gladly would I find myself there for a couple of weeks! But I am up to my ears in work, and then just now I have so many interruptions—parties, picnics, business in London, examinations, &c. We have just begun our musical practisings again. The Jelfs are here, and other ladies who sing very well, and this time we are studying Mendelssohn's Lobgesang. There are difficulties, and it is not easy to keep twenty voices together and conduct them. And I must not swear like old Schneider! I have so much to do I shall probably take no holiday. If I do get to Germany I must go to Leipzig, where I have to print a book. But it must first be written. . . . The gardens are so lovely here now—even my little garden looks nice, and your ivy begins to grow. The heat is beginning, and what that is in these small rooms you know. In about three weeks I am going to Froude to the seaside, and to another friend who lives near Exeter, a brother of Dr. Acland.'

TO CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, May 24.

'It really does one good to be thoroughly scolded and abused. Here no one takes the trouble to do it, and I have done it myself so long without any result that I give the Oxford Don his own way, till at last of his own accord he becomes German again. But I cannot tell you how much one has to bear in this promised land. Here in Oxford everlasting quarrels and squabbles, and lies and slander, and nowhere courage and faith, and no one can speak the truth, and any one who tries to do it brings a perfect hornet's nest about his ears. Can you believe that they have refused an excellent Orientalist, Dr. W. Wright, for the place of Under-Librarian at the Bodleian, because he has dared to affirm that the language of the Phœnician inscriptions is Semitic and not Hamitic, because he doubts that Ham was the father of the Canaanites and denies that Moses wrote the account of his own death? The man is a thorough Christian, is ready to sign the Articles; but it is no good—away with him. And no one moves a finger. Peace at any price! is the watchword. I carried my skin to market, but have been thoroughly beaten, and my friends began to be very much alarmed about me. And then these affairs waste one's time, and destroy all wish for work, so at last I shut myself in, and for weeks saw no one, and heard no one. Happily the Long Vacation will soon begin; if it only lasted the whole year, Oxford would be a real paradise. I have tried my best with the two hymns<sup>1</sup>, but they are very difficult to translate, as our words mean so much which was not yet in the old words. The first hymn contains many Manichean thoughts, as, the ray of light which falls from the realm of light into the realm of darkness, and gives the first impetus to creation. And yet I cannot consider the hymn as modern. It belonged to the collection long before the Brâhmanas were written, and at the time of Pânini its syllables were already counted in the sum total of the syllables of the Rig-veda. I must stay this summer in England. I must finish some work to satisfy my conscience. If I can get it done early, I may cross the water in September. With hearty thanks for your friendly and unfriendly words, I remain as ever, your truly devoted.'

In June, Max Müller took part as representing Oxford in the examination arranged at Exeter by the late Sir Thomas, then Mr. Acland, for middle class and commercial schools, which was the first practical example of the system of Local Examinations since developed and carried out by our Universities. It was the first public speech in any language Max Müller ever made. His first public speech in German was made eight years later at a Philological Conference at Kiel.

From Exeter he went to Bideford to the Froudes', to get a little rest in fine air before hurrying to London for the annual Indian Civil Service Examination. After finishing up some necessary work in Oxford he started in August for Germany, his mother joining him at Leipzig, where he spent some weeks, seeing his Reading Book (German Classics) through the Press. From there he wrote to his friend Kingsley, who was uncle to his future wife:—

LEIPZIG, August 10, 1857.

'MY DEAR KINGSLEY,—How I long to be with you at Eversley, but my work here will keep me longer than I expected, though I have little to say in reply to your letter—nothing in fact but “you are quite right.” Yet I must write to you to tell you that your clear and decisive words have brought me more comfort than pain; they have driven away a swarm of vain hopes and plans, and the sooner these are scattered the better I can wait and work; and sooner or later all this waiting and working will come to an end, for this life cannot last for ever, and it will last no longer than we can bear it. I have no right to complain. I have all I wanted—more than I ever hoped for, more than I ever deserved. A disappointment in love is hard to bear because it destroys our faith in ourselves and in everything else; a disappointment in marriage may be a life-long trial, but it need not destroy our faith in our own nature, in the truth of others, or in the wisdom of God. Life may grow more strange and awful every day, but the more strange and awful it grows, the more it reveals to us its truest meaning and reality, and the deepest depth of its divinity. “And God saw everything that He had made, and, behold, it was very good.” And so far, I believe, we both agree, and if there are a few words in your letter where we differ, it is better to leave them alone till we smoke our next pipe at Eversley. What you say about my going back to Germany is imaginary. It is as unlikely that I should go to Germany as that you should go to India. But if your duty should ever call you to India, would you like to find yourself fettered by a promise which no man has any right to make?—for His ways are not our ways. All I can say is that after an absence of ten years during the most critical time of life, everything is against my ever returning or settling in Germany. I am not wanted here; other people have taken the places I might have had. You will not easily get rid of me, unless you give me notice to quit. Auf Wiedersehn!’

<sup>1</sup> From the Rig-veda, of which a prose translation had been made in Germany for Bunsen.

TO PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER.

Translation.

POTSDAM, August 28.

‘I am much touched, my honoured clever friend, by your amiable desire to see my hoary head once more. My physical powers have been steadily declining for the last nine months, but not my powers of work, nor the mental interest which I take in your creative far-reaching thoughts. I shall stay at home on Tuesday from eleven to two, and gladly expect you. With true friendship, your Vecchio della Montagna,

‘A. VON HUMBOLDT.’

FROM CHEVALIER BUNSEN.

Translation.

CHARLOTTENBURG, August 28.

‘So there he remains in the centre of Germany a whole month, and lets one hear and see nothing of him. Your last letter was a great delight to me. The snail had there crept out of his shell and spoke to me as the friend; but now “Your Excellency” appears again, so the snail has drawn in his head again. Now, my dear friend, you ought to be thanked for the friendly thought of paying me a visit and writing to me. . . . That the Oxford Don should ask if I can “afford him a few hours” shows again the English leaven. . . . What have we not to talk over? The hours belong to the Don's gown, for you know very well that we could in a few hours only figure to ourselves what we have to discuss by turns. So come as soon as you can, and stay at least a week here. You will find my house, to be sure, rather lonely....We two old people are here, however, and full of life.... I must tell you with what deep sympathy and melancholy pleasure your touching idyll has filled me. You will easily believe that after the first five minutes I saw you vividly behind the mask. I thank you very much for having ordered it to be sent to me. I am very glad that you have written it, for I would far rather see you mixing in the life of the present and future, with your innate freshness and energy.'

To this Max Müller replied:—

Translation.

'I was glad to hear that you liked Deutsche Liebe. The story itself is only a frame. What I wished to make clear to myself and others was, why with the inborn love to our fellow creatures, we could show that love to so very few of them only; why love had to be confined almost entirely to the members of our family, to our parents, our wife, our children, and why any attempt to go beyond generally ended in sorrow. It is so, and we know not why, except again to show us that this life was not meant to be perfect, but only to give us by its very imperfections a faith in and a longing for a better life.'

Early in September Max Müller went to Heidelberg, and the following letter to his mother from Bunsen's tells her of his after proceedings. The visit to Weimar was to attend the inauguration of the great Goethe-Schiller Monument there.

Translation.

HEIDELBERG, September 9.

'How much one can get through in a week, and how fast life runs on from one thing to another. A week ago I was still with you, and here I am in Heidelberg, and ready to rush off to England, and meantime I have seen lots of people, and had a good deal of enjoyment. I suppose you are now in Dresden, where you found so much to do that you are getting over our parting, about which you again made yourself so miserable. If you only knew how you pain me by such excessive grief, you would try and bear more quietly what cannot be helped. Our being so long together this year was quite an unexpected treat, and we ought to thank God that we had such enjoyment. Think how few, even of those who live in Germany, can see each other so often and for so long a time as we do, and then do not spoil the joy of meeting by brooding over the parting. Weimar was more than I expected, and through Brockhaus I made acquaintance with many interesting people—Auerbach, Gerstäcker, Rietschl, Devrient, Andersen and many others, and we met and talked together every night till one or two o'clock. I had no headaches, and all went well. The statues were very fine, and Weimar itself most interesting. I could not pay visits, for theatres, parties, and drives took up the whole day. We saw everything, and very well too. Brockhaus and his pleasant wife stayed till Monday. The Wartburg festival was beautiful and the weather was fine. The representations in the theatre were splendid. I found many old University friends, and it will always be a pleasant memory. Monday I went to Frankfort, and came on here Tuesday. I arrived after tea, and Bunsen had just received an affectionate letter from the King, asking him to go to Berlin and stay with him at the Palace. So I really only saw him yesterday, and to-day he started. I stay till to-morrow, and then go direct to Oxford, for I am longing for my work and quiet. Dr. Meyer is here and Dr. Bernays, so I stayed another day, and have seen Heidelberg again, where we once spent such a happy time together. I am very tired, such incessant excitement is too much. I could not hold out much longer.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

OXFORD, October 7.

'Oxford does not feel like home this time, and even my work will not please me. So out of sheer ennui I went last week to Manchester with Thomson to the Exhibition. There was not a bed to be had in any hotel, and so there was nothing for it but to go on to Liverpool and sleep there, and come back next morning early to Manchester. Sir Charles Napier was in the same hotel. The Exhibition was magnificent, but much too much to see in so short a time. We were there from Wednesday to Saturday, and were dead beat when we left. So that pleasure was got through! To-morrow I am going to the country for a few days (to Kingsley's), but take my work with me. I hope to get some riding, which always agrees with me. What you write about Bunsen's Gott in der Geschichte delights me.

'Don't trouble yourself about Jacob. He had not a very successful life, and we learn from it that we must not measure God's wisdom in the ruling of human life according to our ideas. Then the idea of a "people of God" is purely Jewish. There is only one people of God, that is all mankind, Jews as well as heathen. . . . To-day is a day of prayer for India: there is hardly a family that has not friends and relations among the victims, and the feeling throughout England is very great.'

Max Müller undertook two courses of lectures this term, continuing those on the Nibelungen, and beginning a course on 'German Literature.'

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, October 26.

'I suppose you are back at Breslau, and at your work again in the treadmill. It is the same with me in Oxford, and I think with regret of the beautiful summer days that are no more. I feel like Castor and Pollux in one, half day and half night, and I shudder at the thought of the winter in England, and begin already to hope again for the summer in Germany.

'I revel in Meldon's Mythology; it has helped me to see so many things more clearly now, especially about the Zeus Monotheism, which nobody has ever yet treated so simply. And what are you doing? I have not yet received your Aristotelicum. Keep your heart warm!

'I had finished the above when your kind lines reached me. I see now your heart is quite the same. Yes, if I could have you here! The fresh air would do you much good! In Germany I am useless, here to be sure, too—but the air here is freer and purer. I have not heard from Bunsen. I believe in no improvement from above, it must come from below! The Prince of Prussia (who is Regent) will soon make everything so tedious that people will go to sleep. I have neither heard nor seen anything of Pattison, and therefore know nothing of Scaliger and his regeneration. Farewell, rejoice in life and in human beings, who are far better than we think—they are only ashamed of their good souls.'

Early in November Max Müller tells his mother he has bought a horse, and rides almost every day. His little 'Folly' soon became great friends with its master, and was happily for him a quiet creature, for unless with friends Max Müller was apt to sink into a brown study when riding, and many were the humorous stories he told against himself, and the falls and escapes he had. He parted with his little friend when he married.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

December 6, 1857.

'Thirty-four years old. My birthdays here are always quiet and lonely, and when one is as old as I am, one passes willingly over the new step towards the grave without marking it. I often can hardly believe that I am already so old, and you are quite right when you say that I must no longer think of marrying. Well, many have passed through life like me, and if one loses a great deal of happiness by it, I am satisfied with what God has given me. I often long for a larger sphere of usefulness, and my wish to go to India has revived strongly of late. It is quite possible the East India Company may be done away with, and that Government will undertake to rule the country. Whether my Veda will be ruined by this I don't know, but I would willingly exchange this work for a few years, for a scientific mission to India. But these are only ideas and we will await quietly what God sends. My little horse "Folly" is a constant pleasure, but it costs a good deal, and like every one else I expect to be bankrupt! I shall stay here for Christmas, though I have many invitations. But I cannot spare the time; if I dawdle away the summer, I must spend the winter in working hard.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 21.

'You need not begin to frighten yourself about India. If I were to find a chance of visiting it, you would be as pleased as me. It is not out of the world, still less beyond God's hand. It would be of the greatest use and interest to me. But you see how difficult it is to discuss any plans with you; you make life so difficult for yourself and for others by such incessant fears, and it is so much easier only to find out and dwell on the good and bright side of things. I have had a very bad cold for above a week and am heartily tired of it. My Christmas will be very quiet and lonely whilst you are all eating your Stolle<sup>1</sup> joyfully. The children no doubt are rejoicing not a little at the prospect of Christmas. I wish one could look forward with delight, as one once did. Now one is only glad when something has passed by and is done with. The book Brockhaus is bringing out for me is finished at last, the extracts from German authors, from the fifth century to Goethe, with translations of the old German things and notes; but it will not be published till Easter. Then you shall have a copy and read Ulfilas and the Minnesinger. It was a hard bit of work, and I am glad to have done with it. Now I am busy on a book on Indian Religion, and the Veda too is getting on.'

TO A FRIEND.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, Christmas Eve, 1857.

'As one is getting old and looks forward with fear rather than with hope to what is still in store for us, one learns to appreciate more and more the never-failing pleasure of recalling all the bright and happy days that are gone. Gone they are, but they are not lost. Ever present to our calling and recalling, they assume at last a vividness such as they hardly had when present, and when we poor souls were trembling for every day and hour and minute that was going and ever going and would not, and could not, abide.'

<sup>1</sup> Christmas cake.

CHAPTER XI

1858-1859

Letters of Philindus. Canterbury. German Classics. Fellow of All Souls. Jenny Lind. Birmingham Festival. Correspondent of French Institute. Death of Manuel Johnson. Ancient Sanskrit Literature. Marriage. Germany. Life at Oxford. Mother's illness. Correspondent of Turin Academy.

IN the late autumn of 1857, when England was under the influence of the horrors of the Indian Mutiny, a series of papers appeared in the Times signed Indophilus and Philindus. It was soon known that they were by Sir Charles Trevelyan and Max Müller respectively. Sir Charles traced the Mutiny solely to the issue of the famous greased cartridges. The first letter by Philindus was entitled 'The neglect of the study of Indian Languages considered as a cause of the Indian Mutiny.' It points out that ignorance of the languages prevented any real intercourse with the natives, and created a feeling of estrangement, mistrust, and contempt on both sides, and mentions that in the examinations for the Indian Civil Service as many marks could be gained for Italian as for Sanskrit or Arabic. In his second letter Indophilus confirmed all that Philindus had said, and he advocated the establishment of an institution in London for the teaching of Oriental languages. In his reply Philindus repeated what he had already said on this subject in 1854, and anticipated the speech made thirty-two years later in the presence of the Prince of Wales, our present King. More letters followed from both Indophilus and Philindus, from Mr. Monier Williams and Professor Syed Abdoolah.

These letters were collected and published together as a small pamphlet, and diligently circulated; but, as is well known, no arrangements were made by Government to assist their candidates for the Civil Service of India in acquiring the various subjects for examinations; and when the East India Company ceased to exist their college at Haileybury, where so many eminent Indian civil servants had been educated, came to an end also, and it was left to the private unaided efforts of the English Universities to provide the special teaching required.

The lectures announced by the Professor for this term were on 'The Principles of Comparative Philology,' and he was also reading Faust with a class.

During January Max Müller paid a visit of some days to his friend Dr. Stanley, then Canon of Canterbury, where he met Whewell, Sir John Herschell, and others. He tells his mother, 'We were in all a party of twelve, women as well as men, guests of a young, unmarried man.' He adds that he had seen nothing of the wedding of the Princess Royal, and had always hoped it might bring Bunsen over, but he did not come. Max adds:—

'He has been made Baron without his knowledge or will, and the Prussian nobility may be proud that Bunsen has done them the honour of taking such a title. . . . Things still look bad in India; and in France they begin to laugh at England—it is only to bring down the Funds, that Morny may do a little business. But it is splendid when one sees how a small country like England can carry on war with India and China, and quarrel with America, Russia, and France, and yet is always cheerful and never loses her head.'

Truly Max Müller loved his adopted country, though he could see her faults as well as her virtues. He had been naturalized in October, 1855.

Bunsen writes in February:—

Translation.

'I have read your brilliant article on Welcker in the Saturday Review with great delight. In fact everything would give me undisturbed pleasure did I not see (even without your telling me, which however you have done, as a sacred duty between friends) that you are not happy in yourself. Of one thing I am convinced, you would be just as little so, even less, in Germany, and least of all among the sons of the Brâhmans. If you continue to live as you do now, you would everywhere miss England—perhaps also Oxford, if you went to London. . . . Unfortunately I have neither read Indophilus, nor Philindus; please tell me the numbers of the Times. . . I am curious about your German Reading Book. I maintain one thing—you are not happy, and that comes from your bachelor life.'

TO A FRIEND.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, February 14.

'I hear you want some translations of the Greek Classics. Oh that I could read some of them with you! They ought not to be read as if they were very wise and learned and unintelligible books, but as if they were written by a man whom we know and like. Those ancients were exactly like our modern poets and philosophers. In their time they were read and criticized by men and women not a whit wiser than we are. It is mere pedantry if, instead of reading and enjoying their writings, we sit down to interpret them, and to look grave and wise over their volumes. If Plato and Aristotle came to stay at our house, most of our young ladies, to say nothing of how shocked they would be by their manners, would converse with them as they do with Maurice, or Kingsley. They would tell them where they could not quite agree with the views of those wise philosophers, they would think now and then that they talked nonsense, and might speak more like other gentlemen, and they would thank them for anything really good and sensible they had to say. The real charm of the Classics is the simplicity with which they say things which in our modern writers would be commonplace. They had nobody to imitate, nor had they to avoid saying what others had said before. There is no effort, nothing far-fetched in their prose and poetry. And then they did not write merely because they wished to publish a book. They generally wrote because they felt they had something really important to say. They wrote with their whole heart and soul, and if we read them carefully we sometimes imagine they knew that they would be read for thousands of years, and that they wrote for mankind rather than for the drawing-rooms of Athens.

'You were right about my article on Welcker in the Saturday Review. I had lately written a good deal for that journal, and had just told the editor that for the present I could write no more, because I wanted to finish some other work. Now that I find you read the paper, I shall write again, and I daresay you will find me out, although my horrid German handwriting is changed into decent English print. There was a short time ago an article on German Mystics; I sometimes thought of you whilst I was writing it. I have not yet given up my intention of going to India; I might have had an appointment last year, but I found that my mother, though she wrote she would not dissuade me from going, was so much grieved at the thought of never seeing me again, that I felt I ought not to go as long as she lives. I do not know whether it was right, and yet I cannot bring myself to believe it was wrong.'

TO MRS. KINGSLEY.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, February 28, 1858.

'I received your kind message and I must thank you for it myself, and tell you that I have been longing to spend a few warm and bright days at Eversley. But the spring will not come, and I am busy and have to lecture, and to write, and cannot get away. As soon as the sun comes back, and as soon as I hear from you or Mr. Kingsley that I may come, I shall be delighted. I want to lay in a new stock of happiness, though what I carried away from you last Christmas is by no means exhausted.

'I had a letter from Bunsen—he tells me he is pouring out his heart about Hypatia in a preface. Does Mr. Kingsley know of it? Please to tell him also, that my little horse is the most delightful creature, and quite a pet among the Dons and Donnas of Oxford.'

His mother writes early in March that she had been to a ball, to which Max Müller replies:—

Translation.

'There is nothing of that sort for me. Giving lectures and correcting proof-sheets, those are my amusements late and early. Then it is so cold one is quite shrivelled up, and one cannot ride in such weather, and the horse eats his head off and has nothing to do! Froude has been staying with me. I have already told you my salary is raised to £500; I hoped it would be £600, and that is cheap for all the work!'

TO A FRIEND.

55, ST. JOHN STREET, March 7, 1858.

'Your letter written with the accompaniment of Beethoven's Septette was all music to me. What is time and space, and earth and life, and all that people call stern reality? While I was reading your letter I was sitting in a quiet corner of your room—watching the dark cedar tree that stretches out its broad branches to bless you and your house, and I listened to every note, and I thought of the happy days when I drank in the same strange melodies as a child, six years old, and my mother told me it was so beautiful, and I believed it because she told me so, and have believed it ever since. And why? Who can tell us the meaning of those sounds? and whence do they come, and whither do they go? I once asked my old music-master who had taught him music, and he told me that he had a master; and then

I went on asking who had taught his master, and he did not understand what I meant, and I remember how his eyes grew bright when I told him, with all the authority of a child, that I was certain that God must have been our first music-master. And now I am thinking what he wrote in my album when I left him in 1836—I was then sent to school at Leipzig. I shall try to translate it for you. "Music, echo of a distant, harmonious world—sign of the angel within us; when the word is speechless, and the eye, and the tear, and when our silent hearts lie lonely behind the bars of our breast, it is thou, Music, through whom they call to each other and mingle their distant sighs." He was a good old man. I hardly know whether he could have written those lines himself, and, as I am writing them down, I think he must have taken them from Jean Paul; but he must have been a true musician whoever wrote them. Poetry is like poverty—the true poet and the truly poor are ashamed to show what they suffer, and what they are longing for. It is not so with music, and you sometimes find men, who would be ashamed to indulge in any poetical sentiment, plunging with their whole soul into the Unknown, the Infinite, the Beautiful, and the Divine, when it appeals to their hardened hearts with the sounds of music. There is a blessing for every one, and even the cold man of the world has somewhere or other his happy valley and his quiet cottage, where he sees his old friends, his old thoughts, his old feelings, which, if they meet him in the drawing-room, he dismisses with a haughty sneer, as if he had never known them. Excuse my wandering. I must say like you—there is the music, it is all that Septette of Beethoven, which they are playing in the other room.'

The following letter was sent to Max Müller about this time, from a man who had been long in India, confirming the views advocated by Philindus:—

'There seems to be a greater stir than ever in India about education for the natives, and yet in this country young men who obtain direct commissions in the Company's service are not even obliged to have the slightest knowledge of any vernacular before starting. To such an extent is this carried, that I understand from various pupils who were educated here, that a candidate taking up Hindûstânî is looked upon as rather a fool for his pains. I was extremely glad to see from certain letters in the Times that the attention of the future rulers will be directed to this point. The two schemes ought undoubtedly to proceed hand in hand. The poor native ought not to be expected to make every effort to acquire a knowledge of English, without there being also a corresponding effort made by his rulers to acquire the native language.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, April 5.

'To-day is Easter Monday, but the Hare has laid no egg for me, as he used to do in the grandfather's garden. Instead of that, I have sat the whole day at work, except that this afternoon I had a visit from Sir Charles Trevelyan, and also saw Lord Macaulay, whose sister Trevelyan married. The Jelfs are here . . . and I dine there on Tuesday, and we shall have some music. A little boy was born at the Thomsons' a few days ago, and one is soon expected at the Kingsleys', or I should have spent Easter there. I have been several times in London for a couple of days. I had to examine. One evening I heard a fine concert in the new St. James's Hall. I have such a bad cold that every limb aches, and yet I have to sit and slave from morning till evening. I have had a great deal of writing about an Oriental Institute in London, to be founded by Government, and then came a change of Ministry, so now we must wait for a new Ministry. My little horse is my best friend. I must spend the summer in my furnace of a room. I am printing an English book on the Veda, and that must be finished off, if I am not first finished off myself, as you very truly remark.'

During this year Max Müller became more and more intimate with Dr. Thomson, Provost of Queen's, whose house was always a pleasant change for him from the loneliness and hard work of his own bachelor ménage. Mrs. Thomson writes:—

'I know the Archbishop was more devoted to Mr. Max Müller than to any of his Oxford friends, and they met almost daily before his marriage. He retained the same warm affection for Mr. Max Müller to the end of his life, and did so enjoy having him at Bishopthorpe. The Archbishop sympathized in all the difficulties about his marriage, which were confided to him, as Mr. Max Müller had helped him in all the difficulties of his own marriage a few years before.'

At Easter Max Müller's German Classics was published, and was welcomed in Germany as warmly as in England. The Times reviewed it later in the year most favourably:—

'Unlike all other books of extracts we know, it is compiled with a view of systematizing its contents. The extracts are not thrown together at the capricious suggestion of personal taste, but the Professor has chosen only characteristic specimens, and has so arranged them in their relative sequence that they suggest, as it were, a history of the literature of his country. His brief preface shows the scope of his design, and, brief as it is, is the best History of German Literature, in its relation of social changes, with which we are acquainted. . . . We can accept this as an English class-book, peculiarly adapted for our own special purposes.'

On May 9 Max writes to his mother that he cannot ask her to visit him this year; he is so overwhelmed with work, both in Oxford and elsewhere, that she would have to be much alone. Probably the whole summer must be spent at work, but if he can find time for a week or two in Germany, he comforts her with the assurance that he will go to her. The same letter mentions the death of his old friend Gathy. 'I felt it very much. . . . I had so often seen him of late years; he was a thoroughly brave and honest man. The old friends are gathering on the other side, and he must be happier there than here.'

A very few days after writing the above Max Müller was asked whether he would accept a Fellowship at All Souls if it were offered to him. It was the very thing needed at that time to make his life happier and less lonely; the offer was entirely unexpected, and was accepted with great thankfulness. He often mentioned in later years that, as he entered the College after his election, he said to himself, 'My home for the rest of my life. I shall not leave this till I am carried out.'

LETTER FROM SIR ROBERT HERBERT.

March 3, 1902.

'TO MRS. MAX MÜLLER,—Mr. Robarts has told me that you would like to hear from me anything I can tell you about the circumstances connected with your husband's election to a fellowship at All Souls. The story is a very simple one. The person to whom credit is principally due for a step unprecedented at that time—the election of a foreign gentleman to an Oxford fellowship—was the late Henry Coxe, the Librarian of the Bodleian. He and his wife were intimate friends of my family and myself, and I used often to pass a quiet evening with them in Beaumont Street, and meet there Max Müller, for whom Mr. Coxe from the first entertained a warm friendship. I thus became aware that while the status and home afforded by a College fellowship would be an advantage and convenience to your husband, he would, on his part, contribute much honour and pleasure to the College that might secure him as a fellow, and I cordially joined with Mr. Coxe in pressing upon the Fellows of All Souls the advisability of electing him under the special power of doing so conferred by the new statutes. Max Müller could not have failed to find in Oxford a great number of warm friends and admirers, but in the earlier days of his residence there, it must have been a comfort to him to have a home in the College which was so proud of him.—Yours very sincerely, ‘ROBERT G. M. HERBERT.’

Max Müller’s large sitting-room on the ground floor next the Library, in the corner of the great Quad, commanded a beautiful view of the spire of St. Mary’s and the dome of the Radcliffe Library, a view that was a constant delight to him, and was always pointed out to his visitors with loving appreciation.

TO DR. ACLAND.

ST. JOHN STREET, May 26, 1858.

‘MY DEAR ACLAND,—I never thought that anything would happen to me again on which I should be congratulated, but I certainly do appreciate the very kind feeling which prompted the Fellows of All Souls to elect me, and in a dark night even the smallest light is welcome. I am looking forward with great pleasure to living in College, but at present there is no set of rooms where I could put up all my books, &c. I am confident I shall feel quite at home at All Souls for the rest of my life. Wherever our Father leads us, there is our Fatherland.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

ALL SOULS COLLEGE, June 7, 1858.

‘You will wonder when you see my new address. The bells have been rung again for me in Oxford, for I have, quite unexpectedly, received a fellowship in All Souls College. I have very nice rooms, but I only begin really moving to-morrow, and therefore write to-day, as I shall at first have no time for letters. I had no idea of it, and the thing has excited great surprise. A fortnight ago I was asked if I should have any objection if I were elected, and the next day I was elected. Why they elected me I have no idea: it is a great distinction. What I like best is being free from the trouble of housekeeping. My house will be let; my furniture I bring to my rooms here. The rooms are larger, three of them. But now I can’t marry, or receive you as a guest. The Jelfs are here, and are very sorry that I have joined the Monks. Nearly all our fellows belong to the best families in England, several are members of Parliament, some in the Ministry. So you see monkhood is bearable, and I need not have a tonsure! The lectures are nearly over, and in a fortnight I think of going to the seaside.’

FROM THE DEAN OF RIPON.

‘MY DEAR MRS. MAX MÜLLER,—You ask me to tell you some of my recollections of your husband in the early days before you were married. I fear they are scanty; but it is pleasant, as he found it, to make an excursion into Auld Lang Syne.

‘When I went up to Balliol in 1850, he had just begun to give lectures on what was then a new subject, Comparative Philology. I think he had been so immersed in the Rig-veda during the two previous years, that his powers as a lecturer had hardly been tested; but his delight in his subject, his clearness of exposition, and his excellent English, not the worse for the slight foreign accent which he always retained, carried us all away. And the ease with which he traced the startling changes of words, such as that which derived the French word même from semel ipsissimum, came like a series of dissolving views. All such things have become common property long ago, chiefly owing to his very readable books on the science of language and kindred subjects.

‘I met him only occasionally during my undergraduate course. Eight years make a great difference at that time of life. But while I was a curate at Claydon I had the happiness to come across his memorable Essay on Comparative Mythology. It was the best counteraction that could be to the narrowness which sometimes besets an earnest pastorate, and carried one into regions before undreamed of both of history and of thought. I was then a fellow of All Souls, and I went back there in 1857 to read under Stanley, who had just become Professor of Ecclesiastical History. It was then that the happy thought occurred to some of our fellows, first, I think, to my old friend Robert Herbert, to invite Max Müller to become a fellow of the College. This was done under the new Ordinance of the Commissioners for giving effect to the Oxford Reform Act of 1854, which allowed us to elect a Professor, a man of literary distinction, to an “Exceptional Fellowship,” one which bound him neither to residence, nor to celibacy. He was elected in the beginning of 1858; and, though I was at that time appointed to a College living sixteen miles from Oxford, I saw him every time I drove into the city. I remember especially one such time in the summer of 1858, which (all my parishioners being in the harvest field) I spent in my College rooms, having arranged to meet one of our fellows, Godfrey Lushington, to read German together. We were puzzling over some difficult expressions in Lessing’s great “Essay on the Education of Mankind,” when Max came to our rescue, and devoted a large part of two days to our benefit. It was delightful to see his enthusiasm in drawing out the thoughts of one of the greatest of his countrymen, and one hardly realized—he was so simple and genial—that one was being taught by one of the leading philologists in Europe.

‘The Ordinance under which we elected him demanded, though in language not perfectly clear, that we should choose our fellows according to their merits as shown by the examination; but the old custom still remained of choosing them as one would the members of a social club, and I was one of three who had appealed to the Visitor against this practice. The dispute lasted some five or six years, and I am afraid must have given Max some days of discomfort, though his lot was otherwise enviable. He tried to mediate, and asked, but in vain, that the examiners should report a small list of fit candidates between whom the choice should be made. The decision was eventually given according to our contention: but Max, though mainly on our side, had, I think, what is called a “sneaking kindness” for the old system—had he not been elected by the College as it was?—and maintained that those who, as the Saturday Review said, were chosen for “what are vaguely called social considerations,” formed a pleasing variety in the monotony of Oxford residents. But though he used to complain that he sometimes suffered from being identified with us, who were spoken of as the Sepoys in allusion to the Indian Mutiny of 1857–8, I am sure he never had an enemy in the College. He was always genial, and had nothing of the mere Don in him. On occasions such as the annual Gaudy on All Souls’ Day, he would become the German student again, and join with the somewhat tumultuous merriment of the younger fellows, and be induced to sing “Gaudeamus igitur.” If ever there was a cloud upon his brow, it was from a cause unknown to us, and was happily dissipated by the event so full of blessing to you and to him in the following year, 1859. It has always been a dark spot of disappointment to me in the retrospect, that I was prevented by a sharp touch of fever from being present at your wedding.

‘Of all that came after that event no one can speak so well as yourself. But I do not like to close this letter without a word expressive of the value that I entertained for his friendship and for his teaching. I never knew him other than a kind and generous friend, and a delightful companion. He would frankly give one of his best on any subject, grave or gay. I remember, when he brought home from Italy the cartoon of the Carità, that he asked me to look at it in his library, and to say whose work I thought it to be; and when I said that, though I was not much of a judge, I should have assigned it to Andrea del Sarto, he showed as much pleasure as if it had been the testimony of a connoisseur. But I think that his mind turned more and more to the problems of religion; and it is my belief that his researches and his teaching have done as much as those of any man of his generation to enlarge the horizon of men's views, and to win for Christian faith a truer and a wider basis.

‘Believe me, yours sincerely and affectionately,

‘W. H. FREMANTLE.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

ALL SOULS COLLEGE, July 11.

‘When I was in London I made the acquaintance of Jenny Lind. She has a very nice house near Richmond. I called on her twice, and heard the Swedish singers at her house. But she will not sing herself any more, and that is a great mistake. I went too to a great gathering at Harrow; Lord Palmerston was there, and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and all the beau monde of London, and when my name was mentioned there were great cheers. Then I went to a great whitebait dinner at Greenwich, but all this was very tiring. I went too to a concert at the Crystal Palace, 2,500 people in the chorus and orchestra, and yet it was not powerful enough, unless one was quite near.’

In July Bunsen writes to congratulate:—

Translation.

CHARLOTTENBERG, July 31.

‘Nothing could be more agreeable and suitable; it is personally and nationally an honour, and a unique acknowledgement. I can only add the wish that you may enjoy the dignity itself as short a time as possible, and take leave as soon as possible of the Fellow celibates of All Souls. Your career in England wants nothing but this crowning-point. How prosperous and full of results has it been! Without ceasing to be a German you have appropriated all that is excellent and superior in English life, and of that there is so much, and it will last for life.’

For several years Max Müller had been a regular contributor to the Saturday Review, and the titles of his articles show the variety of questions that interested him:—The Transactions of the Philological Society, Dialects of Algeria, Chinese Buddhist Pilgrims, Hindûstânî Literature and the King of Oude, The Origin of Goethe's Faust, Renan's Essays on the History of Religion, The English Alphabet applied to the Languages of India, German Mystics, Anglo-Indian Phraseology, and Latham's Celtic Philology, were among the topics treated by his facile pen. He looked on these writings as a recreation, as a change from Indian Civil Service and Military examinations, from lectures, and from collating and editing the Rig-veda. He had already in 1857 begun to put together the materials for his History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, which required considerable research in works which at that time only existed in manuscript. The Bodleian meetings also made constant demands on his time. No wonder that he complains so often of being worn and weary, and longing for rest.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

ALL SOULS, August 6.

‘I returned yesterday from London, where I had to examine for a whole week from ten till six. My head at last began to buzz, and I am glad that it is over and my holidays at last begin. The summer here is delicious and my monk’s life very pleasant. The front view from my windows is beautiful, and I have the whole College to myself, ten servants, &c.; who can want more? I invite my friends to dinner, and nothing is wanting but that you could visit me in my new home, and it is sad that that cannot be. I can only invite ladies for great festivities. Did I tell you that I paid Jenny Lind a visit lately and she sang to me nearly the whole of the Schöne Müllerin, and so perfectly? She loves the poems, and she said to me, “I felt I must sing them to you.” She sang them with so much expression that it was like a real opera; I hardly recognized the songs. Then she sang Schumann and Mendelssohn. It went on from four in the afternoon till one in the night, and then she sent us in her carriage back to London—Benedict, Joachim, and Piatti. Joachim played very well, and Piatti’s cello was splendid. In fact it was perfection, and she is a most interesting woman, and when she likes very agreeable. I heard lately from Bunsen . . . he invited me to Heidelberg for his birthday, August 26, but I had to write that I could not come, and I must tell you now, I must stay this summer in England. I have had too many interruptions in my work, and must use the holidays to make the time good. You know how gladly I would go to you, but I should not feel it right, for I am quite well, and do not want rest. I have been riding a great deal, which is always good for me.’

To a friend, to whom he had sent a little novel, very popular just then, A Lost Love, he writes:—

ALL SOULS, September 10.

‘Is there such a thing as a Lost Love? I do not believe it. Nothing that is true and great is ever lost on earth, though its fulfilment may be deferred beyond this short life. Marriage is meant for this life only, but love is eternal, and all the more so, if it does not meet with its fulfilment on earth. If once we know that our lives are in the hands of God, and that nothing can happen to us without His will, we are thankful for the trials which He sends us. Is there any one who loves us more than God? any one who knows better what is for our real good than God? This little artificial and complicated society of ours may sometimes seem to be outside His control, but if we think so, it is our own fault, and we have to suffer for it. We blame our friends, we mistrust ourselves, and all this because our wild hearts will not be quiet in that narrow cage in which they must be kept to prevent mischief.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

September 15.

'I have just lately had a good deal of enjoyment from the Birmingham Festival, where I went to hear the Elijah and Messiah, &c. It was splendid. I was on a visit to the Minister of Education near Birmingham, and we drove in each day. English country life is so pleasant; nowhere else is there anything like it. Then I spent a couple of days at Rugby with the head master. Will you send me the book of Weber's songs with "Mein Schatz, der ist auf der Wanderschaft"? I have played it to a very dear friend of mine, and she wishes to have it. She is the daughter of Lord Denbigh, where I often go to stay; she sings well, and you would like her.'

Max Müller had carried through his resolution of spending the chief part of Long Vacation in College. He often said later he was looked at with very dubious eyes by the College servants, who were in general completely their own masters in 'the Long,' but were obliged to stay in College if a Fellow was in residence.

It is evident from the following letter that the feeling of soreness between Max Müller and M. Renan had quite passed away. The article translated by M. Renan was the one which originally appeared in the first number of Oxford Essays, and was afterwards reprinted in all the editions of Chips.

TO M. RENAN.

ALL SOULS, October 27.

'I have looked over the translation of my Comparative Mythology and I think it is excellent. I am extremely obliged to you, and still more to Madame Renan, for the trouble you have taken in making my English language and my German thought palatable to the French public. The corrections I have made bear chiefly on Sanskrit words. . . . In a few passages which I have marked, the chain of the argument seems to me somewhat broken by omitting some of my illustrations. But I leave this entirely to your judgement, as you know how far one may try the patience of the French public.

'I should be glad to have your name on the title-page, as introducing my essay—as you have so kindly done—in the Revue Germanique. It might perhaps be as well to add to my name, "Professeur à l'Université d'Oxford" or Fellow of All Souls College at Oxford, only I do not know how the latter can be rendered in French. . . .

'I have received the second edition of your Grammaire Comparée, and I have to thank you for it in more than one sense. No doubt we shall always differ on some points in the early history of language, and I shall have to oppose some of your views with all my power. But I feel confident that no difference of opinion with regard to scientific questions will ever lead again to any personal misunderstanding between you and me, and I beg to assure you of my sincere respect and gratitude.'

The lectures this term were on 'The Parts of Speech.' In the Summer Term Max Müller had given a course on 'The Origin and Formation of the French Language,' continuing also his class for reading Faust.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, November 11.

'I had a large dinner of 14 and an evening party the other day. Jenny Lind was here, and would sing nowhere but at my party. It was wonderfully beautiful. You can imagine that people were very anxious for invitations and it all went very well. She came first in the morning to practise a little, then in the evening she sang Mozart's "Batti, batti," Mendelssohn's "Auf Flügel der Gesanges," Swedish songs, Schumann, and Weber's "Mein Schatz, der ist auf der Wanderschaft." She came again the next day and sang Schumann and Schubert: it was a great treat, but really almost exhausting.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

BLENHEIM PALACE, December 6.

'You would be surprised to see me sitting here on my birthday, not at All Souls, but on a visit to the Duke of Marlborough. Last week I spent a few days in the country in the house of Lord Lovelace, who married Byron's daughter. It is now inhabited by one of the Judges, the same who managed the divorce of Lord and Lady Byron, a most interesting old man. Yes, you are right when you say I cannot be grateful enough to God for all the goodness He has shown me, my whole life long. My present position is really, of its kind, quite perfect, and if I only keep well I am thoroughly satisfied. Here I was called away to dinner, which was splendid; we dined in the Rubens room, and opposite me hung Rubens and his wife, Andromeda, and Phillip of Spain. We were twenty-four at dinner. After dinner we wandered about the rooms. There was a splendid Erard in one room, and we had some music; the next day I saw the pictures in the private rooms, which one cannot see otherwise, the gems, the sketches, then more music. The Duchess is musical and very friendly. They asked me to stay another day, but I could not. Two days later I had a party from Blenheim to luncheon—Lord Denbigh's family, &c. It went off very well. The Jelfs are here, and we have a great deal of music.'

TO M. RENAN.

ALL SOULS, December 15.

'I have just read your severe remarks on Oriental Studies in England, in one of the recent numbers of the Débats. You are partly right, and I was delighted to see how well you perceived the real and true value of the discovery of the Vedas for the reconstruction of the annals of the human mind, and the right appreciation of the earliest efforts of man in his search for his true home in God. But how few perceive this importance of ancient Sanskrit literature even now. How few of our best Sanskrit scholars are aware that the stones which they bring to light are the relics of a real temple, and the object of philology is not only to cut stones and collect rubbish, but to find the foundations and ground-plan of that lost Sanctuary. We are all progressing, and the importance of our studies dawns upon us by degrees. To the early Greek refugees, the Greek which they taught in Italy was not the key to a lost civilization, not the lever, as it turned out to be, that was to lift the dead weight of the Middle Ages; it was simply an accomplishment, the mark of a cultivated mind and curiosity. Surely there was something grand in the enthusiasm of the faith with which men like Sir W. Jones and Colebrooke pierced into the jungle of Sanskrit, and where should we be if Wilson had not opened to us many a smooth road into that enchanted forest? However, I know what you mean, only the absence of a bold critical spirit is not to be ascribed to the English nation as a whole, it is the languid temper of the present generation. But then there was a time when England had giants in thought, and Davids in boldness and faith. It will come again, and even now what you take for indolence and cowardice is more truly a feeling of awe at the greatness of the questions which now occupy the best minds in France, in Germany, and in England. You and your friends in Paris do much service by recognizing and patronizing what is good and genuine in the literary life of Germany. You might do the same for England, and thus raise your Revue Germanique to a Revue Teutonique, including Scandinavia, England, and America. I also read another article of yours, or rather an extract from your forthcoming translation of the Book of Job, with great interest. Might I ask you whether anything has been done to carry your reprint of your translation of my Essay on Mythology through the Press? I sent you the proof-sheets some time ago, but have not heard of it since. I have been very busy, as I am printing a book on the Vedic Age. I hoped it would have been out before now, but I have so many things to read, as I am going on with my work, that it will hardly be published before Easter. In the summer the fourth volume of the Veda will be finished, if my health allows me to work hard. As soon as I have brought out my book, I have promised to write several reviews, among the rest one on your Origine de la langue, but at present I have not a single moment to spare for anything but the Veda.'

Christmas was passed by Max Müller in All Souls—the only Christmas he was destined to pass inside the College walls—and the wish expressed in the following letter was to be fulfilled in a way he little imagined as he wrote it:—

TO MISS GRENFELL<sup>1</sup>.

ALL SOULS, December 30.

'I cannot let this old year pass away without once more writing to you. It seems such a long time since I heard from you. If I had followed my inclination you would have received many a letter from me. . . . I felt convinced that even without hearing from you, I might always trust in the continuance of that friendship which has been to me a rich source of blessing for many years. I hear about you now and then from our common friend Mr. Walrond, and it is always a pleasure to listen to the cheerful account he gives of you, and all your party. I am glad you appreciate him, and the longer you know him the more you will find how well he deserves your confidence and esteem. This has been a very important year to me, and I know not whether I should be more thankful for the trials I have had to go through, or for the blessings which God has showered upon me. Much more has been given me than I ever asked for, and I feel as if I had no more to wish for in this life. I have found a home, and a very pleasant home, as you will see when you come to Oxford. I have no cares, and if my health continues there is plenty of work for me to do. It is not such a life as I thought mine would be; you know what I have lost. I wish you all a very happy New Year, and I hope that this coming year may sometimes lead us together!

<sup>1</sup> The aunt who had educated his future wife.

The early days of the year 1859 brought Max Müller a great distinction; he was made a Corresponding Member of the French Institute, the youngest man ever elected to this honour.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

ALL SOULS, January 23, 1859.

‘Your wishes for the New Year have brought me a good beginning. . . . This is really the only distinction that I have always wished for, and I have been not a little pleased at it. It is better than Orders, and I don’t think that Tischendorf with all his hangings has been chosen a Corresponding Member of the French Institute. Here in Oxford and London it has been much talked about. It is so peaceful here in the holidays that I cannot make up my mind to go away, though I have a number of invitations, often from people I hardly know. But I prefer sitting quietly at my work, which is getting on. George Bunsen has been with me, and told me many things. Let us hope there will be no rising in Berlin. Then your papers would go down again, but never mind, my Sanskrit papers never go down! My life here is really perfect of its kind, and I say always, things go too well with me.’

TO M. RENAN.

ALL SOULS, January 3.

‘Though I cannot say with Goethe I believe that I am of the religion of Job, yet I thank you most heartily for your Livre de Job. Your introduction is excellent, but now and then one feels like a cat stroked the wrong way. I shall hardly be able to resist the temptation of saying something about it in the Saturday Review, though I have made a vow not to write any reviews till I have finished my own book. I like very much that little hint you give about Aurora, and your reasons why Hebrew remains so barren in myths. Is it not owing also to the strongly marked radical features of every Semitic word, every one telling its own tale by its three letters, and retaining its appellative power against all equivocation? How can you have pantomimes if every person as soon as he comes on the stage tells you that he is not the Lion, but Smug the Joiner? But the Aryan nations have had their revenge. When language had played all her tricks on them, they let her go, and made themselves a new language, and called it Philosophy, and that language the Semites have never learnt. I was delighted, as I need not tell you, at my election at the "Institut," and I thank you for your kind and active support. I wish I could do it in person, but till July I must slave at Oxford.'

The lectures announced for this term were on 'The Principles of Etymology,' with a catechetical class on German Classics, Max Müller's own work being used as the text-book.

Early in March, Max experienced a great sorrow in the sudden death of Mr. Manuel Johnson, the Radcliffe Observer, one of his earliest friends in Oxford, at whose house when he first arrived in 1848 he met many of the leaders of the High Church party, men of true piety, and many of them really learned, and yet, to the great surprise of the young scholar, almost entirely interested in purely ecclesiastical questions—the validity of Anglican orders, whether gowns or surplices should be worn in the pulpit, whether the candles on the altar should be lighted or not—all trifles that made Max Müller ask Manuel Johnson, 'What has all this to do with true religion?' But though Johnson told Max Müller he 'did not understand,' he remained his faithful friend to the last. Max dined almost every Sunday at the Observatory, and when his mother stayed with him she met with much kindness from Manuel Johnson and his wife. He married late in life, and in his bachelor days the large garden at the Observatory was the constant resort of men like Church, Mozley, Palgrave, Pollen, Burgon, &c. His collection of artistic treasures was a never-failing source of delight, and Max Müller tells us he 'learned much from his Italian engravings and Dutch etchings, which he delighted in showing.'

TO DR. PAULI.

Translation.

ALL SOULS, March 13.

'The sudden death of Johnson has been a great shock. For many years I have not lost any more intimate friend, and one often forgets where one really lives, and what a little step it is which divides us from those who have gone before us. The death of our friends is an earnest warning, and as such, in spite of the sorrow, is rich in blessing. You must have experienced this in the fearful trial God laid on you. I need not say that I shared your sorrow, but I would not intrude on your grief, and did not write, though I knew you were in London. I know from experience that one would rather get through the hard struggles of life in silence and alone, and when one has done so, one can turn again slowly towards life, and to one's friends round one, without having to talk over what is past. Work is a great help and comfort, and I rejoice that you have taken up your great work again. Johnson often spoke of you to me, and especially lately. He would so gladly have seen you here as Professor of Anglo-Saxon. For an Englishman he was wonderfully liberal, and I owe my position in Oxford chiefly to his influence. I shall long miss him. He was always the same, open, hearty and joyous. Well, the sorrows of life, like all other things, pass away, and the larger the number who await us beyond, the easier the parting from those we leave behind. I wish you would come to Oxford . . . but write beforehand, as I am feeling so shaken, I may go to the seaside for change.'

This spring his sister was again in great anxiety about one of her children, and Max Müller always felt his distance from all his own people keenly when they were in sorrow. He writes:—

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

ALL SOULS, March 26.

'I often wish I could help in bearing some of your anxieties, for I have little here to make me anxious; however, you would say little pleasure either. But I am satisfied as it is, and thankful for the peace in which my life passes. You have little idea how comfortable the life in College is, and how one lives all day only for oneself and one's work, without being disturbed by anything. I am printing my book on Ancient Sanskrit Literature, and hope it will be ready by Whitsuntide. A French translation of my article on Comparative Mythology is just out, by Renan. I suppose I shall have to go to Paris to thank them for my election. I was elected with Lepsius, and am the youngest member.'

He finishes the letter in London, where he was examining. 'I am staying with Walrond, who is still unmarried; so you see there are other people who are as sensible as I am.'

All through this spring Max Müller worked hard at his Ancient Sanskrit Literature, in which he had embodied the Prolegomena to the Rig-veda, written ten years before, which had at the time called forth Professor Wilson's wrath. Though, through Bunsen's influence, the East India Company gave it their patronage, and promised the money for its publication, it never was published. The reason for this is explained in the preface to this new work. Ten sheets had been printed, when Max Müller's election to the Professorship of Modern European Languages, and the three courses of lectures each year which this election involved, obliged him to lay aside his general Sanskrit studies, and confine the time not needed by the duties of his Professorship, exclusively to the editing of the text and Commentary of the Rig-veda. But though ten years had elapsed since the Prolegomena had been written, Max Müller found that his original views had not been proved erroneous, either by his own later researches, or by the works of other Vedic scholars, and that the greater part of the original manuscript could have been printed as it was. In these ten years many new and young Vedic scholars had arisen, and their works were carefully examined and frequent reference is made to them throughout the book. It is in his preface to this work that Max Müller first mentions a young scholar, Dr. Bühler, then copying and collating Vedic MSS. in London and Oxford. They soon became fast friends, and it was Max Müller who obtained for Dr. Bühler the appointment in India which he filled with such distinction for nearly twenty years. During all that time the friends corresponded on literary questions, and though they often differed, their friendship was close and unbroken. After Dr. Bühler's return from India they met from time to time, and always with a feeling of warm attachment. Max Müller after Dr. Bühler's untimely death in 1898, which affected him deeply, wrote : 'We always exchanged our books and our views on every subject that occupied our interest in Sanskrit scholarship, and though we sometimes differed, we always kept in touch. We agreed thoroughly on one point—that it did not matter who was right, but only what was right.' Ancient Sanskrit Literature was carefully reviewed by the venerable scholar Barthélemy-St.-Hilaire, in five articles in the Journal des Savants, that famous periodical, now nearly 250 years old, the contributors to which must all be members of the Institute of France. 'This new work of M. Max Müller,' says the reviewer, 'shows considerable progress in Vedic studies; it answers and explains a number of interesting and doubtful questions, and it traces for Vedic literature a limit which according to our view is definite. It has brought order and light into the huge and confused treasure-house of the primitive monuments of the Brāhmanic religion, and this systematic arrangement rests on a basis which appears well founded.'

'The History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature will add greatly to the distinction with which the name of M. Max Müller is already so justly marked. The book of which I am writing is of so high an order that one may well doubt whether any one for a long time to come will surpass, or even equal it.'

Professor H. H. Wilson also wrote an elaborate review of the work, which appeared in the Edinburgh Review, October, 1860, being the last thing Professor Wilson ever wrote; in fact the ink of the last words was scarcely dry before the fine old scholar passed away. 'It is not possible,' he says, 'in a brief survey like the present, to render justice to a work every page of which teems with information that no other scholar ever has, or could have, placed before the public.'

A second edition was called for within a year, but so rapid was the progress of Vedic studies at that time, that Max Müller, though often urged to do so, would not publish a third edition, being compelled, after his rejection for the Chair of Sanskrit, to turn his attention mainly to other studies.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

ALL SOULS, Easter Sunday, 1859.

'I am overwhelmed with work, but I have found time to read that book of Schleiermacher of which you wrote to me, and I read it with great interest. It is an important book, more important than his writings. Whether the publication was right it is difficult to say. It is like a post mortem. Many would shrink from it, and yet one learns much from it and it may be of use. Men are so made that they seem ashamed of what is best in themselves, and then it is well to have such books to show us that men are all much better than they seem to be. I am now reading Perthes' Life, which holds much that is important, but without the poetry of Schleiermacher's surroundings. I can well understand that after reading these books you long for some of the Greek Classics, but it is difficult to enter into the old simple life and thoughts; and to enjoy the beautiful and true as they were then felt and thought of, requires longer and more gradual study. You know Schleiermacher's Plato, but it is not easy to enjoy; Phaedrus is understandable, also the Symposium and Phaedon, and these are enough to give you an idea of Plato as a man. I can settle nothing about my summer plans. To begin with, war is sure to break out in Italy, and it may be that powder and shot will be seen on the Rhine.'

It was about this period that the natives of India began to speak of Max Müller as 'Moksha Mûlara,' which was thus explained by one of their Pundits: 'He who by publishing the Veda for the first time in a printed form gave (ra) the root, (mûla) the foundation, the knowledge of final beatitude (moksha), he is called Moksha Mûlara.' At the present day this Indianized form of his name is in common use among those who know his works.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

ALL SOULS, May 29.

'I am very tired, and yet I have still so much to do before I can get away. Now there are the lectures, and I am printing and writing away at my book. Then I have four examinations before me, and then, please God, I shall start. Here in England things are quiet, but they begin to form volunteer corps. The undergraduates drill and shoot, and we are making ready for whatever comes. My horse costs a lot of money, but not so much as a wife. I have been again in London to hear Jenny Lind and Joachim—beautiful. I sat by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Then I had Deichmann the violinist here, and a party to which Mrs. Gaskell (Mary Barton) came. And so one fights one's way through life, and receives many a black eye! I am very sorry not to have seen old Humboldt again, and indeed for him it was time to rest—he has done his day's work.'

And now, after three years of silence and separation, borne submissively as the will of God, bright prospects suddenly opened, and within a fortnight of the last letter to his mother, Max Müller was asked to Ray Lodge as the future husband of her he had loved for nearly six years. His friend Walrond was engaged to her younger sister, and life appeared one dream of happiness to the two sisters. The day after his arrival at Ray Lodge, Max Müller wrote to her uncle, his friend Charles Kingsley:—

RAY LODGE, Whit-Sunday, 1859.

‘Can you believe it? I cannot. I knew not that the world contained such happiness. You know what we have suffered, and now think of us, and pray for us to God, that He may help and teach us how to bear such joy and blessing. The past was so dark and awful, and the world now is so happy and bright. We shall meet on Tuesday. I long to see my new dear aunt, my old dear friend Mrs. Kingsley. Oh, this world of God is full of wonders, but the greatest of all wonders is love.’

Baron Bunsen wrote on July 23:—

Translation.

‘My sons knew too well what delight they would give me by their communication, which has already given us all a foretaste of the delight of your visit with your bride, and meanwhile has brought me your affectionate letter. I have felt all these years what was the matter with you, and I sympathize with your happiness as though it concerned one of my own children. I therefore now, my loved friend, wish you all the more happiness and blessing in the acquisition of the highest of life’s prizes, because your love has already shown the right effect and strength, in that you have acquired courage for finishing at this present time your difficult and great work on the Veda. The work will also give you further refreshment for the future, whilst the editing of the Veda still hangs on your hands. Therefore let us all wish you joy most heartily (my wife has received the joyful news in Wildbad), and accept our united thanks beforehand for your kind intention of visiting us shortly with your young wife. By that time we shall all be united here. Beg your bride beforehand to feel friendly towards me and towards us all. You know how highly I esteem her two aunts, though without personal acquaintance with them, and how dear to me is the cultivated, noble, Christian circle in which the whole family moves.’

His devoted mother wrote, on receiving the news of his engagement from her son:—

Translation.

CARLSBAD, June 16, 1859.

‘MY DEAR, MY HAPPY MAX,—I write to you a few lines in the greatest excitement of body and mind, so that my most ardent wishes and blessings may reach you even before I seem to be able to take in all the happiness. Yes, I thank God with all my heart for my son, who is the pride and happiness and blessing of my life! I thank God with all my heart for my son, to whom He has given his heart's desire, and I ask God that it may be for His children's blessing!

'A being whom you have chosen and whom you have known and loved for such a long time, must be worthy of you, and I will love her with you, as long as I live. My dear, dear Max, if I could but throw my arms round you and press you to my heart! Here I am all alone, so far from you, and I have nobody near who could calm and understand my over-full heart.

'Think what all those who love you so will say to it! And soon you will have a wife, and the happy time of your engagement will be very short, and I am to see you in your great happiness with your wife!

'I cannot write any more, my dear, good Max, the excitement has been too much for me; and you know all I should like to say to you, you know how I love you! And for this my love's sake your wife will love me a little! God's richest blessings be on you both! I press you to my full heart in deepest love, and I thank God with you.

'If you can, write to me soon again. You can imagine how much I should like to know everything. Farewell, my dear, good Max, and bring your G. to see me as soon as possible. With truest love,

'Your faithful Mother.'

Extracts from letters written during June and July :—

'A soul to which I cling with my soul. What is it? What is that soul? Who made it? Who sent it here? Who led it on by slow degrees till it should meet that other soul which belonged to it from the very beginning, and longed for it as for its better Self? These are awful mysteries, we cannot look into them without feeling giddy and appalled, and yet we ought to know of them, and then we can throw ourselves into the arms of God like children, utterly helpless and destitute, and yet full of faith in His love and wisdom. "Dies Leben ist doch schön, o Königin."'

'Think of us two in old Oxford again, and now it will be our home; here we shall live together under God's blessing for many years, here we shall grow old together, and from here we shall pass one day into a new and better life. There will be sorrows too waiting for you when you come here, sorrows such as no life is free from. And we shall bear them together, and remember that the same Father who now sends us so much joy, sends us grief also, and all for our real good, though we do not always see it, and though we cannot venture to fathom His wisdom in guiding our steps through this life. If we trust in Him, our life will not have been in vain, and in spite of suffering we shall be more happy than many whose outward life seems so easy and bright.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

ALL SOULS, August 2.

'This is the last letter I shall write to-night, and it is for you, to thank you for all your love and goodness, and to say that my love for you cannot be lessened or disturbed by any other love : that you know, and I need not say it. And when you see my wife, you will feel how she has given me a new life, and has only increased and raised my love for you and all who are so good to me. I know how you will love her, and I look forward to our life all together with joyous hope. No discord must disturb our happiness, no littlenesses dim our great joy. I will write again from Heidelberg as soon as I can fix the day we shall meet. To-morrow early I start : our wedding is at 11.30. Morier is here ; he came all the way from Naples. I call that friendship.'

On August 3 Max Müller was married at Bray Church to Georgina, elder daughter of Riversdale Grenfell and Charlotte Elliot, his wife.

A week was spent at Eversley Rectory, lent by the Kingsleys, a spot that was very dear to both of them. On the Sunday Charles Kingsley came over for his services, and administered the Communion to the newly-married pair, being their guest afterwards at luncheon in his own dining-room. The week was spent in wandering about the lovely moors or beautiful Bramshill, when they were not occupied with the papers of the examinations on which Max Müller had been busy almost up to his wedding-day. Then two or three days were given to Heidelberg, to the fatherly friend whose affection for her husband made a deep impression on the young wife. From there they went on to Dresden, where the meeting with the mother took place, and the three went together to Chemnitz to the sister, and then to Dessau. Later on, Max Müller and his wife secured a fortnight alone in Prague and Saxon Switzerland, where they had what was a most dangerous experience. They had climbed the Papststein, opposite Schandau, one sultry evening, and whilst at the top, a bare rock without any shelter, an appalling thunderstorm suddenly burst over and all round them. The play of the lightning was terrific, and the crash of the thunder such that they could not hear each other speak, and they felt that any moment might be their last. They hurried down, but it was some time before they were off the bare rocks, and then only to find themselves in a thick wood, which was no safe refuge, and thankful they were when the torrents of rain showed that the danger was passing away.

On the return journey to England, Leipzig, Halle, Brussels, and Ghent were visited. At Leipzig, Max Müller and his friend, Victor Carus, met and played together, piano and violin, as in days gone by; and at Halle he had the interest of a long visit to Professor Pott, the eminent philologist. Oxford was reached on October 24, and Max Müller and his wife settled themselves in a small furnished house in New College Lane for a few months, till they could find something more suitable.

Pending a better house, Max had to keep his books and do his work at All Souls.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

GHENT, October 20.

'We both long for a little quiet, and I for my work. I have had nothing but pleasure and enjoyment these last months, and I am longing for my usual occupations. The time we spent with you was delightful; how few enjoy such happiness as we had together! Take care of your health, that you may not make us anxious this winter.'

Early in November Max Müller's mother was suddenly taken dangerously ill, and his anxiety was very great. It was happily relieved before November 17, on which day his old friend Theodore Walrond was married at Bray Church to his wife's younger sister. Max Müller and his wife were present, and stayed on a few days. 'They would like to keep us here altogether,' he writes to his mother, 'but that cannot be during the lectures, and I am so happy in my own home.'

The committee of the Athenaeum Club had this year offered to elect Max Müller without a ballot, but as he was just going to be married, he felt he could not afford it at that time. He never joined any London club, as he was not constantly in London, and used to say £10 a year was too much to pay for a biscuit, or even a glass of wine!

This year being the centenary of Schiller's birth, Max Müller gave a public lecture on Schiller, which was very well attended. 'All Oxford went to hear him,' wrote a friend. This lecture was published as an article on Schiller in the Times, and afterwards expanded into a longer paper, published in Chips.

Christmas was spent at Ray Lodge with a large family party—Walronds, Froudes, and others; and on December 30 Max Müller tells his mother he had that morning received a diploma from Turin, as Corresponding Member of the Royal Sardinian Academy; and the same day there was a very flattering review in the Times of his Ancient Sanskrit Literature, of which the first edition was already sold out.

It was during this winter that our King was resident in Oxford, as a Gentleman Commoner of Christ Church. Max Müller was often invited to dine at Frewin Hall, the Prince's residence, and the foundation was then laid of that kindly feeling which the Prince ever after evinced for Max Müller, and to which he alluded in such gracious terms in his speech at the opening of the School of Oriental Studies in 1890, speaking of Max Müller 'as one whom ever since my undergraduate days at the University I have had the advantage and privilege of knowing.'

CHAPTER XII

1860-1861

Mother's illness. Death of Wilson. Move to High Street. Sanskrit election. Birth of first child. Wife's illness. Spring at Ray Lodge. Lectures on 'Science of Language.' Visit from his mother. Death of Prince Consort.

THE early days of this year found Max Müller again in deep anxiety about his mother, who had gone to her daughter at Chemnitz for Christmas, where she was taken suddenly and alarmingly ill, and for a day or two there seemed but small hope that her life would be spared. Her son's anxiety was piteous, so far away from her, and unable to do anything for her, or go to her for fear of exciting her. On February 12 he writes to her :—

Translation.

'It was a serious warning, and the years God has added to your life should be all the more valuable and blest. How we suffered with you I need not say. The loss of our parents is the heaviest sorrow we have to bear in life, and nothing can ever blot it out. The separation must come sooner or later, but when it comes something breaks in the heart which can never be the same again.'

TO BRYAN HODGSON, ESQ. (formerly Resident in Nepal).

NEW COLLEGE LANE, OXFORD, February 6, 1860.

'MY DEAR SIR,—I have to thank you for your valuable papers on the Vayu and Kiranti languages. They arrived here during my absence. I was obliged to stay away from Oxford as my wife was very unwell, and I am only just beginning to resume my work. When I shall be able to go through the results of your immense labours I cannot tell at present. My time is so much taken up with necessary work that I cannot allow myself much leisure for my favourite studies. I have to print text and commentary of the Rig-veda, and a second edition of my History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature. Then I have to prepare lectures on the Literature of Modern Europe for my Chair here, not to mention a Sanskrit Grammar, which I promised to finish before the summer. Add to all this the duties of a newly-married man, and you will believe me if I tell you that I have but few moments left for following up my researches into the history of the numberless Turanian languages. I am very glad, however, to know that your important labours, though interrupted, were not left incomplete, and I trust you will find leisure in England for writing a résumé of all your discoveries in the Himalayan Babel. A linguistic map of that country would be very useful, and no one could do this as well as you. Some day or other I hope to return to those steep regions of philology, and nothing could be a better guide than a physical and ethnological map drawn by you.'

The lectures for this term were called 'Principles of Etymology,' but were really on the English language traced back through Anglo-Saxon to Gothic. They were a very popular course, and though attendance at Professors' lectures was no longer compulsory, Max Müller had a large audience. He had talked over these lectures with his wife, and explained them to her, as they walked together in the beautiful Taplow Woods in the clear winter weather, and on their return to Oxford he dictated the whole course to her. It was like the unfolding of a new world, ever reaching back and back, till lost in the hoary distance, where the forefathers of the European nations still dwelt together with the forefathers of the Persians and Hindus, before the great dispersion west and south.

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

NEW COLLEGE LANE, February 6, 1860.

'Oh yes, a sign of life is always good, and so I thank you, my best friend, for your Child of Care. But I should like to know still more how you are, body and soul, and I should also like to know what you think of me and of my happiness. Our missing each other at Heidelberg was a fatality, for I so wished to show you my wife. I really am as happy as a "Child of Care" can be and may be; I often fear the envious Nemesis. What is beautiful is that I have to labour for my bread again, and that also succeeds fairly. I am just printing the second edition of my History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature. Have you received it? I sent two copies to Bunsen, one of them was meant for you. The Veda proceeds slowly, and other things ripen. Tell me what you are doing and planning. I have not heard from Bunsen for a very long time. George is in London, and I hope to meet him there the day after to-morrow. Nothing new happens here. As a married man I can but tell you one thing, stop being a "single" and become a "double" (Einsiedler and Zweisiedler). You can find in all women what is worthy of love, and the one who finds it in you is sure to be worthy of your love.

'I am reading Phaedrus with my wife, and we often think of you in our readings.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

NEW COLLEGE LANE, March 29.

'As far as I can see, we have no MS. of the Historia Sacra of Sulpicius Severus; something by him about Saint Martin, but nothing else. If I knew that you would come over here, if such a MS. existed, I should write to Simonides<sup>1</sup>, but I am afraid nothing will induce you to come over again. It is tiresome that you have not received my History of Sanskrit Literature, the more so as it is my fault. Now the edition is out of print and I am printing a second one. My enemies praise the book, and go so far as to say that it did not come up to their expectations; what ideas people must have of me! Well, something better is sure to come, when I have come out somewhat from my present bliss. In summer I hope to go to my new house, where I shall arrange my library, and then I look for a calm sea (Meeresstille).

'I hope to send you something about Monotheism soon; I do not think you will like it, and therefore perhaps it will bring me a letter. What about your appointment? When you have received that, your double state (Zweisiedlung) must certainly assume another shape.

'And what do you think of Humboldt's Correspondence? No poetry, but much truth. The old gentleman has sat for his biography to Varnhagen, and has shown himself as Varnhagen could understand him. Unfortunately Varnhagen dies soon after, and the whole matter comes undigested before the public. I am glad to see that Humboldt on his part has justified Bunsen, though he has not put a stop to Varnhagen's chattering. But what do the court ladies say? Will there be more of this sort? I have no time for writing; but it will be better when I am in my own house and get all things into order. In faithful friendship, yours,

'M.'

<sup>1</sup> The famous forger of MSS.

TO M. RENAN.

NEW COLLEGE LANE, March 27.

‘If you think the chapter on the Introduction of Writing likely to interest the larger public, I shall be very happy to see it in the Revue Germanique. Boehtlingk has sent me an article of his in answer to my arguments. It does not contain anything to make me change my opinion, or rather to remove the difficulties which I feel myself on the subject. If my article is to be printed in the Revue Germanique, it might be civil to mention B.’s objections. I am printing a second edition of my History of Sanskrit Literature, and find that all my time is taken up, as I have been appointed Examiner in Indian History and Geography and the Sanskrit language for the Civil Service of India. I have, however, made time to review your Histoire des Langues Sémitiques, or rather one chapter of it, on Semitic Monotheism. There were two long articles in print which were to appear in the Times at Christmas, but political subjects left no space, and so they had to be postponed till Easter<sup>1</sup>. We both agree and differ, as you will see, and I feel quite relieved after having expressed what I long wished to say on the subject. I am delighted to hear that you are so hard at work, your second volume progressing, and your Étude sur le Cantique des Cantiques finished. I have promised to write a review of Barthélemy-St.-Hilaire’s researches on Buddhism, for the Edinburgh Review, but it will not be out before the autumn, as all the numbers till then are filled up. With sincere regard.’

Max writes to his mother in April that he has at last found a house in High Street, near Magdalen, and that he will move in in July. In all his letters he exhorts her to lead a quiet, comfortable life, and tells her that he always has enough and to spare for her, and that at her age she ought to give herself more comforts. But it was difficult to induce her to do so, after the long years of frugal living, and to the end she saved more of the money her son sent her than she spent.

Translation.

‘Do not be always thinking how you can spare a few shillings, but enjoy the precious years God has added to your life, with constant gratitude, with quiet and purity of soul, looking more to the heavenly than to the earthly; that gives true joyfulness of soul, if we every moment recollect what is eternal, and never quite lose ourselves in the small or even the large cares of life. My love to Auguste and Krug, who nursed you so carefully, whilst I could do nothing to help. May God send His warm sunshine on you, and make your lives as happy as He has made mine, so far beyond all I deserve !'

<sup>1</sup> Reprinted in Chips, Vol. I, first edition.

TO M. RENAN.

6, NEW COLLEGE LANE, May 6.

'I have been expecting to hear from you for some time, and I am almost afraid from your silence that you did not quite approve of my review of your work which I sent you at the time of its appearance in the Times. The articles have certainly attained their object in England, as I have heard from many quarters. They have drawn general attention to your work, and they have inspired others with the same feelings of respect and admiration for your labours which I sincerely entertain myself. Your works stand too high to be made the object of a merely laudatory review, and I believe that where I have ventured to express a difference of opinion I have done so, not only with that respect which is due to you from everybody, but with the warmest acknowledgement of the value of your researches, even where they did not seem to me completely to confirm the results which you derive from them. I still hope I may be mistaken in my misgivings, but if there should be any expression which could have given you offence, I trust you will tell me openly, and believe beforehand that it was used unintentionally. I am anxious to hear what you think on the main point on which we differ, though in form rather than in substance, and I look forward to your second volume for the full discussion of this question. My hopes of spending part of the summer at Paris have vanished again ; my wife is not well, and we shall have to stay quietly at Oxford. Have you seen a volume called Essays and Reviews ? It would interest you and somewhat surprise you, if you consider that all the writers are clergymen of the Church of England.'

Two days after this letter was written, Professor H. H. Wilson, Boden Professor of Sanskrit at Oxford, died almost suddenly after an operation. It has been already mentioned that his last piece of work was a review of Max Müller's Ancient Sanskrit Literature, which was published in the October number of the Edinburgh, and was, as the editor says in a note, 'a posthumous testimonial by the first Sanskrit scholar of the age to the erudition and worth of the most eminent of his followers.' When the funeral was over, Max Müller announced himself as a candidate for the vacant Chair, and soon issued his testimonials, which included the names of nearly every Oriental scholar of real eminence in the world. Though the election was not to be before December, the canvass, which was begun at once, occupied nearly the whole year. On May 19 Mr. W. S. W. Vaux, of the British Museum, wrote to Max Müller :—

‘On many occasions, and especially the last time (about two months since, in the East India House) when I had the pleasure of seeing him (Professor Wilson), he stated that in his judgement you were the first Sanskrit scholar in Europe. I remarked that I was glad to hear him give so decided an opinion, as I and several others naturally were anxious that his successor at Oxford should be the fittest man we could procure. To this he said, “You will be quite right if your choice should fall on Max Müller.”’

The two following letters, from the Bishop of Calcutta and Dr. Pusey, are of interest as showing the good they expected from Max Müller’s election to the cause of Christian missions, though Mr. Jowett wrote much about the same time that he could not make up his mind whether Max Müller or his opponent would do most for missions :—

RAVENSWOOD, SIMLA, July 13, 1860.

‘MY DEAR SIR,—When I heard of the great loss which Sanskrit literature had sustained by the death of Professor Wilson, my thoughts naturally turned to you as his obvious successor, and it will give me great pleasure to hear that the University make an election which is certainly expected and will be approved by every one to whom I have spoken on the subject in this country.

‘I feel considerable interest in the matter, because I am sure that it is of the greatest importance for our missionaries to understand Sanskrit, to study the philosophy and sacred books of the Hindus, and to be able to meet the Pundits on their own ground.

‘Among the means to this great end, none can be more important than your edition and Professor Wilson’s translation of the Rig-veda. It would be most fitting in my opinion for a great Christian University to place in its Sanskrit Chair the scholar who has made the Sanskrit scriptures accessible to the Christian missionary.

‘I am glad to have this opportunity of thanking you for the clear and satisfactory letter which you wrote to me a year ago, when I consulted you on a theological difficulty which had arisen between two missionaries, as to the translation of some expressions in our Articles into Bengali. Such questions are likely to multiply, and it will be a great point to have the Sanskrit Professorship occupied by one who takes an interest in them, and from thoroughly understanding the Hindu theological terms, is able to give advice on the subject, so that it may express our meaning in a manner which will be at once accurate and will avoid the pantheistic notions which abound in Hindu philosophy, and might by an ignorant translator be transferred to Christian teaching.

‘You are at liberty to make any use that you please of this letter.

‘With every wish for your success,

‘I remain, my dear Sir,

‘Yours very sincerely,

‘Professor Max Müller.

‘G. E. L. CALCUTTA.’

FROM DR. PUSEY.

CHRIST CHURCH, June 2, 1860.

‘MY DEAR PROFESSOR,—On the first election to the Sanskrit Chair, you will have heard that we were divided before two great names, Professor Wilson, whose first-rate Sanskrit knowledge was in the mouth of every one, and Dr. Mill, who, many of us thought, might fulfil the object of the founder better by giving to the Professorship a direct missionary turn. The same thought would naturally recur to us now, and I have kept myself in suspense since our sudden loss of Professor Wilson. My first impression, however, is my abiding conviction, that we should be best promoting the intentions of the founder by electing yourself, who have already done so much to make us fully acquainted with the religious systems of those whom we wish to win to the Gospel. It is obvious that without this knowledge a missionary must be continually at fault, ignorant alike of the points of contact of which, after the manner of St. Paul, he may avail himself, or of those which present the chief obstacles to the reception of the Gospel in the minds of those whom he would win. I cannot but think then that your labours on the Vedas—while they attest your wonderful power in mastering this ancient Sanskrit (and of course of the more modern Sanskrit, through which you had access to the older), and while they evince, as I understand, great philological talent, beyond the knowledge of Sanskrit itself—are the greatest gifts which have been bestowed on those who would win to Christianity the subtle and thoughtful minds of the cultivated Indians. We owe you very much for the past, and we shall ourselves gain greatly by placing you in a position in which you can give your undivided attention to those labours by which we have already so much profited. You know that I have felt it my duty to confine myself to a different class of languages, those which bear directly upon Hebrew. I have written, therefore, on that upon which I am alone competent to write—not your great knowledge of Sanskrit, of which we have such eminent testimony, but of the great value of that special line of study to which you have devoted yourself. Your work will form a new era in the efforts for the conversion of India, and Oxford will have reason to be thankful that, by giving you a home, it will have facilitated a work of such primary and lasting importance for the conversion of India, and which, by enabling us to compare that early false religion with the true, illustrates the more than blessedness of what we enjoy.—Yours very faithfully, E. B. PUSEY.’

The middle of June Max writes to his mother :—

‘My time is quite taken up with the election business, and I sometimes wish I had not thought of it. It will absorb my time till December, and if I don’t win I shall be very cross ! Only think of 4,000 electors, scattered all over England, and each must be written to ! In a week the British Association meets here, as in 1847, the first time I made an address in English.’

His old friend Carus came over for the meeting, and stayed with Dr. Acland. Max Müller was far too much occupied to take any part in the discussions, even in opposing the fierce attack of Mr. Crawford (the famous Objector-General) on the doctrine of the Aryan race, and the connexion between Hindus and the nations of Europe.

Early in July Max was busy in London examining the candidates for the Indian Civil Service in Sanskrit, Indian History and Geography. On his return to Oxford, the move to the new house, 64, High Street, took place, but his wife was so unwell that he sent her away to her father’s, undertaking all the trouble himself.

TO HIS WIFE.

July, 1860.

‘Surely everything is ordered, and ordered for our true interests. It would be fearful to think that anything, however small in appearance, could happen to us without the will of God. If you admit the idea of chance or unmeaning events anywhere, the whole organization of our life in God is broken to pieces. We are, we don’t know where, unless we rest in God, and give Him praise for all things. We must trust in Him, whether He sends us joy or sorrow. If He sends us joy, let us be careful. Happiness is often sent to try us, and is by no means a proof of our having deserved it. Nor is sorrow always a sign of God’s displeasure, but frequently, nay always, of His love and compassion. We must each interpret our life as best we can, but we must be sure that its deepest purpose is to bring us back to God through Christ. Death is a condition of our life on earth, it brings the creature back to its Creator. The creature groans at the sight of death, but God will not forsake us at the last, He who has never forsaken us from the first breath of our life on earth. If it be His will, we may live to serve Him here on earth for many happy years to come. If He takes either of us away, His name be praised. We live in the shadow of death, but that shadow should not darken the brightness of our life. It is the shadow of the hand of our God and Father, and the earnest of a higher brighter life hereafter. Our Father in heaven loves us more than any husband can love his wife, or any mother her child. His hand can never hurt us, so let us hope and trust always.'

On his wife's return they settled down to their quiet busy life, feeling for the first time really at home, in their own house, with his books and all their wedding gifts round them. His joyous, happy temperament, and thankfulness for every trifle, made life very bright, notwithstanding the anxiety and hard work connected with the coming election. His little garden was a constant pleasure to Max Müller, and he often worked in it. A flight of steps led to it from his study window, so that he could step out at any moment when tired with work, and enjoy his roses, of which, next to violets and lilies of the valley, he was passionately fond.

It was about this time that Max Müller received an invitation to deliver a course of lectures the following spring at the Royal Institution on Comparative Philology. He at once accepted the invitation, and continued to lecture at the Institution from time to time for above thirty years, his last course there being delivered in March, 1894, on the Vedânta Philosophy. Beyond bringing out the second edition of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, writing a very few articles for the Saturday Review, and preparing his lectures, Max Müller got through but little literary work this year. The sunshine within the house was a delightful contrast to the weather without, for it had been a summer of almost ceaseless rain, and at the usual time of hay-harvest the hay-fields round Oxford were all flooded.

Max Müller had been kept in constant anxiety about his mother's health all through the spring and early summer, and at the end of August wrote and offered to pay her a short visit, but she felt hardly well enough for the excitement.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

September 7.

'I think you are right in being quiet and alone. To see you again, and then to have to leave after a week, would be almost too much for me, how much more for you? Our lives are in the hands of a Father who knows what is best for all of us. Death is painful to the creature, but in God there is no death, no dying; dying belongs to life, and is only a passage to a more perfect world, into which we all go when God calls us. When one's happiness is as perfect as mine is, then the thought of death often frightens one, but even then that is conquered by the feeling and the faith that all is best as it is, and that God loves us more than even a father and mother can love us. It is a beautiful world in which we live, but it is only beautiful, and only really our home, when we feel the nearness of God at each moment, and lean on Him and trust in His love. And so I trust God will spare you to us, as long as it is good for us; and when the hour of parting comes, we know that love never dies, and that God, who bound us so closely together in this life, will bring us together where there is no more parting. . . . I wish you could see us here: our home is charming, and when I remember how I arrived here with one "box," my heart runs over when I see how God has blessed me.'

In September Max Müller and his wife went to Brighton, where he enjoyed the sea-bathing, and renewed his old love of swimming. There were several swimming competitions during their stay, and he always joined the competitors, and was glad to find that he kept up his former power of rapid and strong swimming.

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

64, HIGH STREET, October 21.

'I found your letter on my return, and I write at once to thank you for the beautiful and flattering proof of your friendship. All that comes from you I read with true joy, as far as I can understand it, and I look forward heartily to the fresh feast. Till the middle of December I shall have no leisure. December 7 is the election: whether I am to succeed is doubtful, but I hope I shall, especially as I have lost six months with canvassing. We are all well here; my wife is in good health, our house is all in order, nothing is wanting any more, and I thank God if all remains as it is now. It is true, happiness drives nails into our soul, but all is for the best.

‘I hear nothing but sad things about Bunsen. I should grieve to lose that man.

‘When will you come to England again? In faithful friendship.’

In the last days of November he heard of the death of his friend and benefactor, Baron Bunsen, who passed away at Bonn, after many months of suffering, so that at first the thought that he was at rest overpowered the sense of loss. But the feeling of loss grew ever stronger as time went on, and a year later Max Müller wrote to M. Renan: ‘I miss Bunsen more every day. I feel as if I had lost a limb, and I can hardly believe sometimes that one is never to see him again here below.’

On December 7 the election to the Sanskrit Professorship took place, and Max Müller was rejected. A few days before the election an unknown friend wrote to one of the papers summing up the difference between the candidates, as ‘the difference between respectable and honourable proficiency, and the complete and masterful knowledge of the subject possessed by a rare genius and profound scholar, from whose authority on the subjects of Indian philology and philosophy there is no appeal in Europe,’ and then, adverting to the objection to Max Müller as not being an Englishman, the same supporter adds:—

‘Mr. Max Müller’s English is perfect. Many who have not heard the wonderful force and clearness of his public lectures must have read, without knowing it, some of his many contributions to periodical literature. Nothing that I know of—of thought or expression—exists to differentiate Max Müller from the highest type of refined and educated Englishman.

‘But the implied charge of un-English religion, and even of irreligion, is at once the most serious, the most gratuitous, and the most cruel. If the country clergy have been persuaded, as has been wittily said, to smell rationalism in the dots over the ü in Mr. Müller’s name, I cannot hope to dissipate the detested odour. I can only submit that there is not the slightest particle of ground for the suspicion, not the faintest show for the pretext that Mother Church is in danger. Surely the support and deferential testimonials of the men of highest character and well-known religious opinions in the University should suffice to dispose of such a vague and ungenerous insinuation. A man's personal character must stand very high, and his theological opinions can afford but little ground for animadversion on either hand, when he unites as his unhesitating supporters Dr. Pusey and Dr. Macbride.'

Dr. Pusey had worked day and night for Max Müller, and when helping to send out the final notices of the election, wrote in his own hand above those he sent: 'Max Müller has already done more for the Gospel in India than any other Sanskrit scholar, by opening to our missionaries their sacred books. His election would enable him to devote himself to that work. He is the first Sanskrit scholar living.'

It was observed by an elector that could the votes have been taken by weight, there was no doubt how the matter would have ended. There can be no doubt that it was a keen disappointment to Max Müller, but he lived long enough to trace his almost unique position later in the world of letters, and the influence he was able to exert on religious thought in England, to this very disappointment. Had he been successful, he must have devoted his great powers almost exclusively to Sanskrit, and by doing so would no doubt have remained to the last what Wilson pronounced him to be at the time of his (Wilson's) death, 'The first Sanskrit scholar in Europe.' It was the Chair of Philology, founded some six years later specially for him, his name being mentioned in the statute of foundation, that led him on from the Science of Language to the Sciences of Thought and Religion. As Professor Macdonell says, in his admirable obituary notice in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society—

'Nothing was known about Comparative Philology when Max Müller came to this country. He introduced and popularized the new science, and soon came to be regarded as its chief exponent. He was, moreover, the first to inaugurate the study of Comparative Mythology in this country. . . . It was not till the latter half of the century that the necessary conditions were at hand for founding a science of religion. Max Müller was there to apply the needful stimulus . . . and to collect the requisite materials in his Sacred Books of the East. Thus there was a great opening in these highly important branches of learning, but no one man could have taken advantage of them . . . , had he not been one of the most talented and versatile scholars of the nineteenth century.'

The following letters were received soon after the election, and were kept together and always treasured by Max Müller :—

FROM HIS FATHER-IN-LAW.

'I know not when I have felt more deeply for the trials of others or had more reason to admire patience and resignation to God's will than in the spirit you have shown, in what I know to be a most severe trial and bitter disappointment. But now that all is over, and I have time to think, I am inclined to believe that with such unscrupulous opponents we could not have won. They had every element of success on their side, but one, and that they disavowed as affecting the claims of the candidates, namely the vast inferiority of one to the other. It must be a bitter disappointment to feel that the path of usefulness you had proposed to follow has been cut from under your feet, . . . but it is God's will, and the time may come when you will see His wisdom in disappointing your hopes and wishes.'

FROM DEAN (THEN CANON) STANLEY.

CHRIST CHURCH, December 8.

'You must allow me to write a few words to express what I cannot say. I have never experienced the peculiar trial under which you are suffering, but I believe, from my own bitter disappointment on your behalf, I can feel what it is for you. You will have many consolations. I need not dwell upon them. But you must also give us the best consolation that we can have, and that is the assurance that we have not been mistaken in the high expectations we had formed of you. You have it still in your power, thank God, to turn your energies from this wretched turmoil to the pursuits which have made your name what it is. You can still show that, although not Boden Professor, you are and will remain the oracle of all who wish to know the secrets of Indian literature and religion. You can still by your writings show what the Christian religion may be to India and the world, as you could not do before, lest you should be suspected of unworthy motives. You can still show us how the Christian scholar and philosopher can put to silence by Christian magnanimity "the ignorance of foolish men." [Can one not hear the beloved little Dean's inimitable chuckle as he penned these words?] You can in this crisis of your life rise to the greatness of the occasion, and make your friends more proud of you, than if they had brought you into the Professorship by a majority of hundreds. "Leave off wrath and let go displeasure ; fret not thyself, else shalt thou be moved to do evil.”

 With bitter regrets at not having exerted myself more, with the truest sympathy for you and yours.

Ever your sincere friend,

‘A. P. STANLEY.’

It was not easy to carry out his friend’s advice, for not content with the signal victory they had gained, his opponents brought various utterly unfounded accusations against Max Müller, as that he had inspired an article in his favour which had appeared in the Times, and other equally vexing and untrue allegations, which, though triumphantly disproved by men like Dr. Pusey, the Provost of Queen’s, Dr. Jacobson, Professor Mountague Bernard, and Mr. Dasent, the editor of the Times, were at the time distressing as tokens of personal animosity and malice. To a man of so loving and truthful a character, these attacks were peculiarly painful. His friend Regnier expressed the unanimous feeling of continental scholars in a letter in which he says, ‘I kept on declaring, in spite of what any one could say, that your defeat was impossible.’

To his mother he wrote, December 16 :—

‘The last days have been full of disturbance. You will have seen by the papers that I did not get the Sanskrit Professorship. The opposite party made it a political and religious question, and nothing could be done against them. All the best people voted for me, the Professors almost unanimously, but the vulgus profanum made the majority. I was sorry, for I would gladly have devoted all my time to Sanskrit, and the income was higher ; but we shall manage.’

Of this election Mr. Tuckwell writes :—

‘I remember the contest for the Sanskrit Professorship, wherein I voted and, as far as I could, worked for him (Max Müller): an inferior candidate being preferred before him, first because Max was a German and therefore a “Germaniser” ; secondly, because a friend of Bunsen must of necessity be heretical ; thirdly, because it was unpatriotic to confer an English Chair on any but an Englishman.’

Canon Farrar thus describes this event :—

‘Müller himself was made to feel the prejudice in Oxford against any novelty in 1860, when he was passed over for election to the Sanskrit Professorship. It is fair indeed to allow that it was not strictly political or religious opposition that was made to him; but the Englishman's dislike to an adopted son, and the feeling that it was not necessary to go afield to choose the absolutely best man, provided the candidate was respectable. I was of course on Müller's committee; but I soon found that there was no solid ground for hoping for his success; and hardly expected that he would poll so many votes as he did. But in truth Müller's claims were incomparable, as having really performed for early Sanskrit literature that which the Alexandrian scholars of the second century B.C. had performed for Homer, editing the text and reconstructing the antique grammar. Müller himself (this shows his goodness of heart) could not imagine why any other motive could outbalance the sole question as to who was the best candidate. He did not realize the stubborn fixedness of English and Oxford preference for an old Oxford man. Müller felt his disappointment. He was especially grieved with some of his opponent's committee; for he was a man of spirit and sensibility. He could feel the virtue of resentment, but was too noble to display the vice of revenge.'

But all other feelings were swallowed up by the terrible anxiety that fell upon Max Müller very soon after the election. On December 20 his first child, a girl, was born, and for two days his wife lay between life and death, and the doctors gave up all hope of saving her. The horror of that time he never forgot, and six months afterwards, writing to his friend Palgrave, who had lost his father, speaks thus of his experience:—

OXFORD, July 8, 1861.

'MY DEAR OLD PALGRAVE,—I should have tried to see you again to-day, but I know from experience that in the presence of great grief I have nothing to say, and for a loss like yours there is no comfort till we can say by ourselves, "Thy will be done." I remember but one time in my whole life when I could not say that, and my trials have been hard at times, harder than I thought I could have borne. But when my wife, whom I had loved for six years without the faintest hope of ever calling her my wife, when she, after one year of a blessed life, was for two days given up as hopeless by the doctors, then I broke down, and I could not say, "Thy will be done." And yet what is the tenure of all our happiness? Are we not altogether at the mercy of God? Would it not be fearful to live for one day unless we knew, and saw, and felt His presence and wisdom and love encompassing us on all sides? If we once feel that, then even death, even the death of those we love best and who love us best, loses much of its terror: it is part and parcel of one great system of which we see but a small portion here, and which without death, without that bridge of which we see here but the first arch, would seem to me a mere mockery. That is why I said to you it is well that human art cannot prolong our life for ever, and in that sentiment I should think we both agree. I have felt much for you, more than I cared to say. We are trained differently, but we are all trained for some good purpose, . . . and the suffering which you have undergone is to me, like deep ploughing, the promise of a rich harvest.'

As soon as his wife was sufficiently recovered, Max Müller took her and his child to Ray Lodge, where they remained until June, he going once a week to Oxford for his lectures there. He joined the Maidenhead Company of the Berkshire Volunteers, to which his father and brothers-in-law already belonged, drilled and marched out regularly, and was soon an excellent marksman; though his drill-sergeant used to complain of his drill, and declare over and over again that 'those gentlemen who think were a difficulty,' as they did not readily become the mere machines which even now is still considered the perfection of a private soldier. Later in the summer, and in subsequent years, he camped out with his company. This he particularly enjoyed, and often in after years laughed over their experiences on the Downs and elsewhere with his kind friend Lord Wantage, who was Colonel of the Berkshire Volunteers.

The agitation about Essays and Reviews, which had been going on ever since the publication of the book, reached its high-water mark in this spring, when Canon (afterwards Dean) Stanley's famous article on that work appeared in the April number of The Edinburgh Review. Max Müller, knowing many of the contributors to Essays and Reviews, had taken a keen interest in the whole affair, and discussed it in many a walk with Canon Stanley; but the following is the only letter found on the subject:—

TO CANON STANLEY.

RAY LODGE, April 17.

'I have not divulged the authorship, but I have just finished the article, and there is but one man in England that would have written it. I think that, next to Garibaldi, you are the bravest man in Europe, and the liberty you are fighting for is worth more than the freedom of Italy. I am proud to be mentioned by you in your article and in your preface. As to myself, I try all I can to forget December 7, and I begin to feel that I shall do more, as I am now, than if I were in the easy-chair of Sanskrit. But I am afraid I shall never feel at home in Oxford again, though it was the place I loved most in all the world. I feel very nervous about my lectures in London; I am afraid they won't be interesting to many people. I shall publish them as soon as they are delivered.'

In April began the lectures at the Royal Institution. There are doubtless some still who remember the enthusiastic interest they excited, the lecture-room being more and more crowded as the course went on, whilst Albemarle Street was filled with the carriages of those who attended them. Max Müller was very nervous beforehand, but by the end of his first lecture he felt that he carried his audience with him, and the interested faces of Bishop Thirlwall, the late Duke of Argyll, Dean (then Canon) Stanley, F. D. Maurice, Dean Milman, Faraday, and John Stuart Mill, not to mention many others, were an incentive to him to give of his very best.

An intimate friend who was present at the lectures reported: 'Max Müller was quite self-possessed, his wife proudly humble.' A lady who attended these lectures thus recorded her recollections years afterwards: 'I remember him then as a slight, intellectual, and interesting-looking young man, with a very clear enunciation, and a perfect command of language, and it was amusing to meet him again a few years ago as a square-shouldered, elderly grandfather.'

'These lectures,' says Professor Macdonell in Man, February, 1901, 'afterwards published in an extended form, passed through a large number of editions, and soon raised their author to the rank of the standard authority on philology in the estimation of the English public. Though much of what is contained in these lectures is now out of date, there can be no doubt that they not only for the first time aroused general interest in the subject of comparative philology in England, but in their day also exercised a valuable stimulating influence on the work of scholars in the sixties and seventies. Here Max Müller first displayed that power of lucid popular exposition, and of investing a dry subject with abundant interest, which has more than anything else contributed to make his name at least as famous as that of any other scholar of the past century.'

In a most interesting lecture given on December 2, 1900, before the University of Allahabad, by Pundit Satish Chandra Banerjee, these lectures are thus described :—

‘Nearly four decades have now rolled away since Max Müller delivered at the Royal Institution in London his “Lectures on the Science of Language,” and so much has been done since, and mainly by the learned lecturer himself, to educate the popular consciousness, that it is difficult for us to realize to-day the value and importance of these lectures. As I turn over the pages of these volumes, I come across much that I feel disposed to characterize as the A B C of the science, much that seems scarcely to require the abundance of explanation and illustration with which Max Müller has thought fit to enforce and support it. But we have to remember that when these lectures were first delivered, much of this was new, novel, and startling ; it was in fact a new light which was breaking forth upon the dark and then uninviting fields of Comparative Grammar and Philology.’

‘It is,’ said a contemporary review, ‘a fact of no ordinary significance that, in the height of the London season, an enthusiastic audience of both sexes crowded the benches and endured the heat of a popular lecture-room, not to witness the brilliant experiments, or be fascinated by the revelations of a Faraday or an Owen, but to listen to a philosophical exposition of the inner mysteries of language.’

Max Müller has told in Auld Lang Syne of several amusing incidents connected with the delivery of his lectures, particularly of the slight estimation in which he was held by Anderson, Faraday’s demonstrator, who was so well known to frequenters of the Royal Institution forty years ago, who could not understand a man wanting no gas or experiments, not even a blackboard at first. As soon as the lectures were over, the Max Müllers returned to Oxford. The printing of the lectures began at once, and the book was out by July 9. It passed through fourteen editions, and was rapidly translated into French, German, Italian, Russian, Swedish, and Dutch, and became a most popular book in America. It was chosen by Cardinal Newman as a favourite prize-book for boys.

On July 1 Max Müller had the delight of welcoming his mother to his home, and showing her his child. She remained until the middle of October, thoroughly enjoying her son's pretty house, and going with her children to stay at Ray Lodge, and Rugby, where one of the masters, Mr. Charles Arnold, with his German wife, were old friends of hers from 1856.

The summer passed quietly and happily away, Max Müller preparing the second edition of his Lectures on Language, and working at the fourth volume of the Rig-veda, which had been delayed for a time—first, by the change of power from the East India Company to the Crown, and the doubt whether Her Majesty's Government would continue the publication of the work, and secondly, by the loss of so many months in 1860 through the Sanskrit election.

The following letter is given as among the first of the long correspondence with Messrs. Longmans, Max Müller's valued publishers, the last letter of which, in his own handwriting, is dated August 25, 1901:—

TO WILLIAM LONGMAN, ESQ.

OXFORD, October 21, 1861.

'I am much pleased to hear of the very rapid sale of my Lectures. I hardly expected a second edition, certainly not so soon. Some of the best reviews I believe are still to come, in the Times, Fraser, Edinburgh Review, Journal des Savants, &c. You must know best whether it is prudent to make as large an edition as the first. . . . I fully appreciate the advantage of publishing my books with a firm such as yours, and I ascribe not a little of the success of my Lectures, as compared with the success of my earlier publications, to the popularity of your house, and your experience and judicious arrangement. So I hope we shall have no difficulty in coming to an equitable arrangement with regard to this, or any other books which I still have in petto, and hope to finish if all goes well.'

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

64, HIGH STREET, November 1.

'Some time ago I sent you a sign of life, i.e. my Lectures, and I should much like to hear by letter how you are and what are your plans for your life. I am well, and I should much wish for you the same sunshine which Heaven has bestowed upon me, though a few dark clouds and storms belong to it also.

'How delightful if we could have you here! Germany is beautiful, but England is free, and I know how peculiarly such an atmosphere would agree with you. I have had lately a visit from George Bunsen—a brave fellow—but his father I miss more and more, and I am sure you do too. I have only just read the essay on Bunsen by Abeken, but something much more complete is to be desired. I have just begun to print a second edition of my Lectures on the Science of Language, and a very large one indeed. Can you send me, when you have read it, some corrections and additions? But it would have to be by return of post, as I have begun the printing already. I should like to talk to you about some points in it, but letter-paper is not sufficient for spiritual intercourse.

‘Nothing new from here. Jowett has not been burnt, and the spark has not caught fire yet. But when it begins to burn, it will burn thoroughly. Pattison has married a young wife, and is now Rector of Lincoln College. Is there anything new to read in Germany? I have only just read Strauss’s Ulrich von Hutten with great interest.’

TO M. RENAN.

OXFORD, November 17.

‘I heard the other day of your return from the East, and should have written to you at once to congratulate you and your friends on your safe arrival, if M. Durand, who mentioned your being at Paris, had not told me at the same time that you were in deep affliction<sup>1</sup>, and, as far as I could understand him, suffering also yourself from illness. Those afflictions are too sacred to allow any one to intrude on the sufferer, with the expression of even the most sincere sympathy. They bring us face to face with our Father in Heaven, and when we speak and struggle with Him we want to be alone, quite alone. I speak from what I felt myself about a year ago, when my wife was given up by all physicians, and at last restored to me miraculously, I mean through the mercy of God. I have gone through much trouble since I last wrote to you, but yet I feel more like myself again, and begin to see that all was as it ought to be. We both lost a true friend in Bunsen. . . . I had another severe trial in failing to obtain the Chair of Sanskrit at Oxford: calumnious falsehood and vulgar electioneering tactics caused the result, and deprived me of the one sphere where I might have worked with all my heart and soul. However, I have got over that; I dare say it would have made my life too perfect, and disappointments are good discipline. Lastly, I want to send you a book, my Lectures on the Science of Language: I gave them in London, and they were well attended. I have now printed them, and am preparing a second and very large edition. I need not say I am anxious to have your opinion more than that of any one else. Whether for good or evil, the book has struck root in England, and there is to be a German translation in a very short time. I believe it contains some things that are new, some that are true, and some that will have to be given up as we advance towards the truer knowledge of the mysteries of human speech.'

<sup>1</sup> The sister who had educated Renan died at Beyrout of fever.

Kind permission has been given to insert this letter:—

FROM DEAN LIDDELL.

CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD,

November 16, 1861.

'MY DEAR MÜLLER,—Few things, of late, have given me so much satisfaction as reading your Lectures, though perhaps I should have had yet more satisfaction if the book had been addressed to readers and not hearers. Will you bear with me if I jot down one or two points which I think require more precision or fullness of statement, in a new edition, which I hope will be (as I am sure it ought to be) wanted soon. It is humiliating to hear that these lectures have been delivered to the heedless ears of Oxford hearers.

'(1) In the last chapter, you use "as an illustration only, not as an explanation," the fact that metals, &c., ring a sound, each with its proper sound.

'How far do you mean the analogy with human speech to go? Do you mean that each attribute denoted by a Root—as ma, ku, &c.—is expressed by that Root as peculiarly and properly as gold or silver by their respective ring? or do you mean, generally, that man as naturally expresses each general idea by some sound, as gold is betrayed by its peculiar ring, &c.? Has each general idea its own sound, or only a sound? I am unable to collect from your statements which you intend. For, while your argument seems to imply that each idea has its own proper sound, I cannot but doubt that you really mean to carry the analogy so far. If you do, I think a good deal more is required to prove the statement. If you do not, a few words are needed to guard against such a conclusion.

'(2) Is not the term "Theoretical Stage" of science somewhat inaccurate? Theoretical questions arise in the infancy of all sciences, and doubtless they cannot be answered till the process of classification is far advanced or even completed. If this is what you mean, I think your general and absolute statements respecting the three stages require modification. I am aware that (p. 20) you admit that "there have been instances" in which theoretical questions have arisen even in the first stage. I have my doubts whether this is not the rule, rather than the exception. Look for instance at the ancient Physics. Look at Smith's and Stewart's Theories of Language, &c.

'(3) I note a few special points that have caught my eye—(p. 21): "I expect we shall have to do something else." This, I think, is hardly a classical use of the term "expect." It would be impertinent in me to express admiration of the almost uniform precision of your English. . . . [Various other small corrections follow.]

'Yours very truly,

'HENRY G. LIDDELL.'

Max Müller's mother left him when the autumn weather set in, and he writes to her:—

Translation.

64, HIGH STREET, November 20.

'I have not been well enough to write much lately, but have read a good deal, among other books Varnhagen's new work. It is wonderfully interesting, and shows signs of a very noble nature, though weak and cross-grained. He misunderstands many people, and therefore dislikes them—as specially Bunsen. His expressions with regard to him are really infamous, but I don't care for that: words do not make truth, and what he says is not true. One must not mind such false judgement of really noble impulses. As a picture of political and mental efforts, of the stupidity, even madness, of the Government, the book is invaluable. How furious the people in Berlin will be! That the publication has been allowed at all shows the advance made since 1848.'

Early in December, Max Müller received a letter from a gentleman in California, who had read his Lectures, urging him to study 'the philological connexion of the Indian languages of Mexico and the Alta California, and thus possibly find a key to trace its ante-Columbian history.' Though Max always felt a keen interest in the North American Indian languages, and when the Mohawk undergraduate Oronhyatakha was in Oxford, prepared a skeleton Mohawk grammar from what he learnt from him, the subject was too remote from his own special line of study, and required far too much time for him to take it up, though he was constantly urging the duty of doing so on American students, and was always very much interested in the publications of the Smithsonian Institute of Washington.

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, November, 1861.

'It is so difficult not to grow very fond of this life and all its happiness, but the more we love it the more we suffer, for we know we must lose it, and it must all pass away. Does love pass away too? I cannot believe it. God made us as we are, many, instead of one; Christ died for all of us individually, and such as we are—beings incomplete in themselves, and perfect only through love to God on one side, and through love to man on the other. We want both kinds of love for our very existence, and therefore in a higher and better existence too the love of kindred souls may well exist together with our love of God. We need not love those we love most on earth less in heaven, though we may love all better than we do on earth. After all, love seems only the taking away those unnatural barriers which divide us from our fellow creatures—it is only the restoration of that union which binds us altogether in God, and which has been broken on earth we know not how. In Christ alone that union was preserved, for He loved us all with a love warmer than the love of a husband for his wife, or a mother for her child. He gave His life for us, and if we ask ourselves there is hardly a husband or a mother who would really suffer death for his wife or her child. Thus we see that even what seems to us the most perfect love is very far as yet from the perfection of love which drives out the whole self and all that is selfish, and we must try to love more, not to love less, and trust that what is imperfect here is not meant to be destroyed, but to be made perfect hereafter. With God nothing is imperfect; without Him everything is imperfect. We must live and love in God, and then we need not fear: though our life seem chequered and fleeting, we know that there is a home for us in God, and rest for all our troubles in Christ.'

TO M. RENAN.

OXFORD, November 30, 1861.

'I was touched when I saw to-day in the Journal des Debats your thoughtful and sorrowful lines on the death of our old friend d'Eckstein. I had long been without news from him, and now that he is gone I regret and I reproach myself for not having written to him more frequently. His death reminds me of the happy time in 1846 when I was at Paris attending Burnouf's lectures, and when d'Eckstein helped me and encouraged me, and when I was fighting my way through difficulties which now would seem to me almost insurmountable. And yet I was never so happy as in those days, when sometimes I had to go without a dinner because I could not pay for it, and when I used to copy for d'Eckstein, who paid me for my work in his own generous way. Yes, we have lost many men whom we can hardly afford to spare; we still suffer from Burnouf's death, we shall long miss the presence of our friend Bunsen, but when I think of what we have lost I feel it all the more a duty to live, to work in their spirit, and thus to keep alive, as it were, some small portion of their spirit. I am sure you will feel the same, for you have a great work before you; you are wanted and you will not fail. I should like to hear from you that you are well, in body and mind, and that you do not lose your faith in the work which you have begun, and in the work which is still before you. The revival of learning in the fifteenth century was the dawn of Reformation, and I believe a similar era is approaching to fulfil what the Reformers intended, but which was frustrated by political events. You have an element in France which, if properly advised and directed, might become a most powerful engine for good, as it may be, if left in bad hands, for evil. Germany must follow the example of Italy, and must look not only for political union, but for religious union on high and neutral ground. In England too there is a yearning after real Christianity, though the struggle will be a hard one. It is a time worth living for, and I feel convinced that you will be wanted even for a greater work than that of finishing your Histoire des Langues Sémitiques.

Max Müller and his wife were at Brighton at the time of the Prince Consort's death. Though he had seen but little of the Prince, Max had the truest admiration for his character, and seems to have felt strongly how much the country which misunderstood and misrepresented the noble Prince to the last, really owed him. He had sent his Lectures to the Prince as soon as published, and they had been most kindly acknowledged. They were by the bedside of the Prince at the beginning of his illness, as if lately read. Gracious permission has been given to insert the following letter, written nearly twenty years later, when the Queen sent Max Müller the last volume of the Prince Consort's Life. The five volumes, each with Max Müller's name written and signed inside by the gracious Sovereign whose subject he was proud to be, will remain a precious heirloom to his children and children's children.

‘OXFORD, den 13<sup>ten</sup> Mai 1880.

‘EURER MAJESTÄT lege ich meinen tiefgefühlten Dank unterthänigst zu Füßen für den letzten Band des Life of the Prince Consort von Sir Th. Martin.

‘Der Verfasser hat von neuem seine sichere Kunst, seinen richtigen Takt, sein tiefes Verständniss und seine ehrfurchtsvolle Auffassung der ihm gewordenen Aufgabe herrlich bewährt, und das Geschick, mit dem er die ihm anvertrauten "goldenen Fäden" in sein eigenes Gewebe hineingewebt, so dass Jeder, der Augen hat, sie sieht und fühlt, und sie doch nie die Harmonie des Ganzen stören, beweist die geübte Hand des wahren Meisters.

'Mit ernstesten Gefühlen schliesst man das Buch und trennt sich von ihm wie man sich schweren Herzens von einem lieben Grabe trennt. Wie anders hätte die Welt sein können, wie viel Gutes wäre möglich, wie manches Unrecht unmöglich, wenn zwei Augen sich nicht so früh geschlossen! Auf das Warum, das immer und immer wiederkehrt, kann die menschliche Vernunft keine Antwort geben. Nur ein fester Glaube an eine Weisheit und eine Liebe, die Alles übersteigt, was wir Weisheit und Liebe nennen, bringt, wenn auch nicht Trost, doch Ruhe und Frieden auf den einsamen Lebensweg. Was wirklich unser war, das kann keine Macht uns rauben, und nichts auf Erden bleibt uns so sicher als der Besitz vergangenen Glücks.

'Mit wahrer Verehrung habe ich die Ehre zu verbleiben

'Eurer Majestät dankbarer und unterthänigster Diener,

'F. MAX MÜLLER.'

Translation. 'OXFORD, May 13, 1880. YOUR MAJESTY,—I beg most humbly to offer the expression of my deeply-felt gratitude for the last volume of the Life of the Prince Consort, by Sir Theodore Martin. The editor has again nobly proved his sure skill, his true tact, his deep sagacity, and his respectful comprehension of the task committed to him. The dexterity with which, without disturbing the harmony of the whole, he has spun the "golden thread" entrusted to him into his own material, so that every one who has eyes sees and feels it, shows the practised hand of the true master. One closes the book with solemn feelings, and leaves it with a heavy heart as one leaves a loved grave. How different the world might have been, how much good had been possible, if two eyes had not been closed too soon! Human reason can give no answer to the wherefore that returns over and over again. Only firm faith in a wisdom and a love that is far above all we call wisdom and love, brings—if not comfort—yet rest and peace on the lonely path of life. What was really ours, no power can take from us, and nothing on earth remains so surely ours as the possession of bygone happiness.—With deep respect, I have the honour to be your Majesty's grateful and most obedient servant, F. MAX MÜLLER.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

December 15.

'What will you say to the death of Prince Albert? He died last night at eleven of gastric fever. This will involve great changes. The Queen can hardly bear the whole burden alone, so there may be a Regency, probably with the Prince of Wales, at first for three months only. It is a fearful loss for the Queen, who has no one who can so help her: and the whole country will long feel his loss. So everything teaches us that our home is not here, but beyond, and that here there is no lasting happiness. How many have gone before us these last years! Would that we were convinced that we must soon follow, and that everything here is but a preparation for what is better!’

TO M. RENAN.

BRIGHTON, December 16.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,—I have read your letter with deep interest and sympathy. Such trials as you have had to pass through are not sent without a purpose, and if you say that they have changed your views of life, such a change in a character like yours can only be a change in advance, a firmer faith in those truths which have been revealed to the dim sight of human nature, a stronger will to resist all falsehood and tampering with the truth, and a deeper conviction that we owe our life to Him who has given it, and that we must fight His battle when He calls us to do it. I am not afraid that you could ever desert the post which you have so nobly occupied, and though I am rejoiced to hear that a sphere of honourable activity will be open to you as a successor of Quatremère, I cannot believe that Science alone will ever fill the whole of your heart. I cannot help believing that we are on the eve of great religious and philosophic struggles. There is a longing after true and primitive Christianity in the best spirits of England, France, and Germany, and there is a general desire after an outward union and communion, which is possible only on the basis of that faith which was in Christ as the Son of God, and which is the lifespring of all religion, however different the wordings of formulas and sects. With the restitution of the Papacy to its true function, a great step will have been made. Germany at the time of the Reformation objected to an Italian Pope much more than to the head of a Church. So did England, so to a great extent did France. As soon as the Pope has ceased to be Prince of Rome, a movement will begin in which the true purposes of the Reformers will be realized and through which negative Catholicism, as you call it, will become positive Catholicity. In that movement much will turn on France, and on your Emperor, and that is why I wish to see at his side honest, wise, and learned men. I am staying at Brighton with my wife, who has been very ill, but is now much better. I have just finished my second edition of my Lectures on the Science of Language. I should like to know what you think of them. I know we differ, and in my second volume I shall have to fight with you, but I hope and trust that our literary differences will only draw us more closely together. There is that charm about your views and opinions, that they are carved out of marble and not out of plaster. They stand out clearly and firmly and one may grapple with them, but when I read a work of Steinthal's, and even many parts of Humboldt, I feel as if walking through shifting clouds. It may be my fault, there may be much depth of wisdom in all that darkness and vagueness, but I cannot help thinking that there is nothing that cannot be made clear, and bright, and simple, and that obscurity arises in all cases from slovenly thinking and lazy writing. Adieu. Yours with sincere regard.'

TO PROFESSOR BENFEY.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 17.

'Though I have put my Oxford address at the head of this letter, I am sitting in reality in Brighton, and from my window I look upon the sea about twenty steps from here. Both of us, I as well as my wife, needed sea-air, and so we hope to enjoy this refreshing atmosphere here till Christmas. Many thanks for your letter. I have also made use of Strabo's remarks about the population of the Caucasus. In a few days a second edition of my Lectures on Language will be ready. My chief aim has been reached: the book has been read and has excited great interest in the science of language. It is my conviction that we know nothing really which we cannot teach (I think Aristotle was of the same opinion), and that nothing exists which cannot be clearly and intelligibly expressed. It requires time and trouble indeed, but it is effective, and that is the greatest reward of all work and study.

'The death of Prince Albert is an incalculable loss. It is only now people seem to realize that something good can come even from Germany.'

Christmas was spent at Ray Lodge, quietly, as it was throughout England. The thought of their widowed Queen, and the sad Christmas at Osborne, weighed on all hearts, and the universal mourning, not only in the upper classes, but among servants, tradespeople, and even the poor, showed how the nation was sorrowing with their loved Sovereign.

CHAPTER XIII

1862-1863

Birth of second child. Exhibition. Stay in London. Ewald. Ranke. Fourth volume of Rig-veda. Second course of lectures on Science of Language. Paris. Germany. North Italy. Lectures at Edinburgh. First visit to Windsor.

ON their return from Ray Lodge to Oxford, Max Müller settled down to work at the Rig-veda, determined that the fourth volume should appear this year. In fact, the whole year was one of strenuous work, for a second edition of his Lectures on Language came out before the end of January, and a third in May, before the book had been out eleven months, each edition being of 1,250 copies.

Towards the end of January he went to Lord Ashburton's for a couple of days, and from there he writes to his wife:—

THE GRANGE, ALRESFORD, January 24, 1862.

'I had a miserable day for travelling, pouring all the time. However, I found all my trains quite right, and arrived at Winchester about one. There I went to Mr. Moberly, one of the masters, and had luncheon. They have a baby five days older than ours, but she cannot run yet. Then we went to Dr. Moberly's, and with him all over the school and cathedral. He explained it all most excellently, but we must go there together. The cathedral is magnificent, but when I have you with me, and sunshine, it will be much more magnificent. . . . At half-past three I started for a nine miles' drive, and arrived here in time for tea. Lady Ashburton seems very pleasant, and he is a perfect English nobleman—I mean what he ought to be. I got your letter this morning, and I hope you got mine. Yes, we are very happy, and I feel as if this life could give us no greater happiness than has been ours these two bright years, and that if we are called away sooner or later we ought to part cheerfully, knowing that this earth could give no more than has been ours, and looking forward to our new home as to a more perfect state, where all that was good and true and unselfish in us will live and expand, and all that was bad and mean will be purified and cast off. So let us work here as long as it is day, but without fearing the night that will lead us to a new and brighter dawn of life. I wish you had been here with me, for it is a delightful place, and very pleasant people. Mrs. Sartoris is the Mrs. S. Adelaide Kemble, and she still sings most beautifully. The Bishop of London, too, appeared at dinner, and is staying here. To-night I hear the Bishop of Winchester is expected. The house is full of the most exquisite treasures of art, such pictures! Van Dyck, Titian, Velasquez, Andrea del Sarto, &c. This morning it was bright, and we had a long ride; we started with about twelve horses, and such beauties they all were, and even your old husband had a splendid gallop, but came home quite drenched with rain. We were caught by a pouring shower, and when I came home I had no second coat, and had to appear at luncheon in my Volunteer cape—a splendid figure. Then I found I had not got my grey trousers, but had taken an old pair. However, I contrived to hide them in my cape, and looked a regular night watchman. In the afternoon I sat in my room and read, and now I am looking forward to to-morrow, when I shall have you and the little one again. They have a little one here, eighteen months old, a very nice girl, but no boy coming—and that must be a disappointment with such a place to leave. We have had a very pleasant time, and if they ask us both I shall be very glad to come again.'

On February 21 his second child, another little girl, was born, and he writes to give his mother the good news, adding, 'A little boy would have been nicer, but I am quite as pleased with a little daughter, and girls give less trouble and anxiety than boys.'

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

64 HIGH STREET, February 23.

'Sooner than I expected I have received from my publisher the prospect of a third edition [of the Lectures], and I write therefore to remind you of your kind promise to send me some "corrections and additions"; it would be the more welcome, as a translation into German by Professor C. Böttger in Dessau is to appear at the same time, and the German reviewers have sharper eyes than the English ones. Last week I lived in great disquietude, and the day before yesterday I became father for the second time. Thank God, all passed over happily, but the anxiety and trouble is so great, I feel quite exhausted and ill, and the doctor sent me to bed, but I did not stay there long.

‘I had a visit to-day from a Mohawk Indian; he has learnt Latin and Greek, he has come to Oxford to study here, but fancy! he has brought his feather garb with him, but according to the statutes of the University, I am afraid he may not wear it. I found the man very intelligent, and the savages more tolerant than many a civilized man.

‘Aufrecht has got the Professorship of Sanskrit in Edinburgh. It was offered to me (£500), but I could not make up my mind to leave Oxford, and I am so glad to know that Aufrecht is now so well provided for. I do not know whether you have ever met him. He is just thinking of publishing a new edition of his Umbrian and Oscan Inscriptions.

‘Have you read the hyper-sceptic and somewhat arrogant book of Sir Cornewall Lewis, Historical Survey of Ancient Astronomy? Lepsius and Mommsen ought to answer him.’

Oronhyatakha, the Mohawk mentioned above, was a most interesting man. Dr. Acland had met him when he was in Canada with the Prince of Wales, and said something which the Indian interpreted as an invitation to Oxford. At all events, early in 1862 he appeared, having been helped in his passage-money by friends. With a wild man’s feelings about hospitality, he expected Dr. Acland to receive him in his house, and provide for him. He had been well taught in Canada at a missionary school, and funds were soon collected to enable him to study at Oxford. He used to come regularly to Max Müller, who by dint of much questioning extracted a skeleton grammar of the Mohawk tongue from him. Not that he knew what grammar meant, but by getting him to translate the English equivalents, a student could arrange the grammatical framework. One day, when writing down some declension or conjugation, Max Müller suddenly saw an irregularity, and stopping him, said, ‘Why do you say that? It ought to be so-and-so.’ The Mohawk looked puzzled at first, and said, ‘What you say is the way my old grandmother talked, but we now say as I have told you,’ thus showing the rapidity with which an unwritten language may change. Oronhyatakha went on very well in Oxford, but some unfavourable accounts were received of him from some of the missionaries to the Red Indians, and it was thought best to send him back to Canada. He was very unhappy, and the day he came to say good-bye to Max Müller he looked very fierce, and said, 'I buried my tomahawk, but I know where to find it.' He quieted down, however, on arriving in Canada, where he trained as a medical man, and as such has done good work among the settled portion of his own people.

The following letter was written by Max Müller to his old friend Baroness Bunsen, on hearing of the death of her daughter, Baroness Ungern-Sternberg: it shows that in the midst of his own happiness he did not forget to 'weep with those that weep.'

64, HIGH STREET, April 2.

'I saw in the papers the sad news of the new loss you have suffered, and though I fear almost to intrude on your grief, which is sacred ground, yet I cannot but send you a few words of sympathy to tell you how deeply I share in your affliction. Your husband's death I feel to-day as keenly as when I first heard of it. I feel it as an affliction that has fallen, not on you only, but on all of us; the world is changed since he has left it. Life has lost something of its brightness since those bright eyes and that bright sound of his voice closed. Some part of ourselves is dead in his death. I did not write to you then, because words are such poor things, but I have mourned for him; I always shall, not only as for a friend, but as for a man such as I shall never see again. When I saw the loss of your young, blooming daughter, all the happy days of Carlton Terrace came back like a dream. How perfectly happy your life was then; it was happiness even to watch it. And yet God knows that we want rain and storm as much as sunshine, and He sends us both as seems best to His love and wisdom. When all breaks down, He lifts us up. I have myself suffered deep grief—for three days my wife's life was despaired of. But when we feel quite crushed and forsaken and alone, we then feel the real presence of our truest Friend, who, whether by joys or sorrows, is always calling us to Him, and leading us to that true Home where we shall find Him, and in Him all we loved, with Him all we believed, and through Him all we hoped for and aspired to on earth. Our broken hearts are the truest earnest of everlasting life. May He who alone can send comfort help you to bear the affliction which He has sent. My wife begs me to add the expression of her deep sympathy, and I remain, with sincere regard, yours very truly, 'M. M.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, April 6.

'I am hard at work, and am printing my Veda and a third edition of my Lectures. Our garden is very gay, full of tulips and hyacinths, and is a great amusement to us. I get but little time for reading. I read the Mendelssohn letters with great delight. They are interesting to those who knew the man, and show his great amiability, but the right pith is wanting sometimes. They have been translated into English. I have not yet seen Varnhagen's new volume. The weather here is very bad, and Oxford is surrounded with water.'

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, April 19.

'It is so difficult not to lead a selfish life, placed as we are, with all our duties at home and with hardly any duties to fulfil which are really painful. I feel I ought to work, and do nothing but work, but then I like my work, and though I believe in the end it will answer some good and important purpose, yet whatever I do redounds to my own benefit too. . . . I sometimes think I ought to give more time to you and to society, but I have a feeling that time is so precious, and I have a good work before me, and I should like, with God's assistance, to finish it. It will serve to show the glory of God in the government of the world from the beginning; it will show that there was no portion of mankind ever forsaken by our common Father; and though His ways with the various races of men are wonderful, and at first very perplexing, we must learn from God and not attempt to prescribe to Him how He might better have brought about His mysterious purposes with the sons of men. Well, I feel I ought not to forsake that work; small as it may seem, it will be an important element hereafter for a true appreciation of the history of the world—that great drama in which nothing is without a purpose and a meaning, from the beginning to the end. Much of my work at present is only clearing away rubbish, and would not interest you, but there is a temple underneath, as will appear by-and-by.'

M. Stanislas Julien had persuaded him to send in his Lectures on Language in competition for the Prix Volney. On July 29 he received the following letter from M. Flourens, the head of the Commission, announcing his success:—

INSTITUT DE FRANCE, July 28.

'MONSIEUR,—Permettez-moi de vous annoncer que la Commission du Prix Volney a décerné, tout d'une voix, le prix à votre bel ouvrage.

'Le plus ignorant de vos juges, et le plus heureux de votre succès,
'FLOURENS.'

Translation. 'SIR,—Allow me to announce to you that the Commission of the Prix Volney have unanimously adjudged the prize to your beautiful work. The most ignorant of your judges and the most happy at your success,—FLOURENS.'

It will be remembered this was the second time the prize had been awarded to Max Müller, as author of the best work on language, written in any language during the year.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, May 29.

‘I am very well, though I have so much work. I do not know often how I shall get through it all. I have so many examinations—six to get through in the next two months. It is tedious work, but brings in money. How I wish you could see our garden! The roses and pinks are coming out, and all looks so fresh, and is a great delight to us. The middle of June we think of going to London for a fortnight to see the Exhibition.’

The Kingsleys came to stay with the Max Müllers this year for Commemoration, bringing their eldest daughter. Jenny Lind, who came for one of the concerts, dined one evening at the Max Müllers’, and as many people were asked to meet her as the rooms would hold. Deichmann, the violinist, was of the party, and there was also some good amateur singing, but the host and hostess could not ask their distinguished guest to sing. At last, she herself walked to the piano, and sang, accompanied by her husband, five songs by Schumann, one after another. It was very hot weather, and the windows were all open, and High Street filled rapidly at the first sound of the great singer’s voice, which rang out into the night, and was heard for a considerable distance. Mr. Tuckwell recalls the scene in his reminiscences:—

‘I was his guest sometimes in his pretty house opposite the Magdalen elms, where played Deichmann—

Whose bowing seemed made

For a hand with a jewel—

where Jenny Lind warbled, and Charles Kingsley stammered in impassioned tête-à-tête.’

Another reminiscence of Mr. Tuckwell’s belongs to this year. Max Müller ‘consulted me about two matters in which, strange to say, I was better informed than he—the art of budding roses, and the conduct of marine aquaria. He watched me one day in our garden putting in some buds, and tried his hand, but gave it up presently, saying, “While you are budding a dozen standards, I can earn £5 by writing an article.”’

During this year more than one letter passed between Max Müller and his old friend Dr. Patteson, the Missionary Bishop of Melanesia, who had found the Lectures on Language a great help to him in studying the many dialects of his scattered diocese.

The Rev. R. H. Codrington writes:—

TO MRS. MAX MÜLLER.

ST. RICHARD'S WALK, CHICHESTER,

March 6, 1901.

. . . ‘One thing I very well remember, and that was the Bishop’s personal affection for your husband. I don’t see that Miss Yonge has mentioned in her Life of the Bishop that they met at Dresden when both were young men. The Bishop certainly cherished the memory of those times, and when he talked, as he often used, of the great work of the Professor at Oxford, he used always to speak as a warm friend, not as fellow worker in languages or a learner. He always gave a copy of the Lectures on the Science of Language (when he could get one) to men who joined the mission, and he advised us to start with as much knowledge of that book as we could get. For my own part, I am sure that I never should have made any progress in the study of Melanesian languages but for the help and encouragement that I got in that way, and afterwards when on my return for a time to England I was wishing to write something. My own gratitude will never fail. . . . Yours very sincerely,

‘R. H. CODRINGTON.’

FROM BISHOP PATTESON.

AUCKLAND, N. Z., May 30, 1862.

‘MY DEAR MÜLLER,—I am very glad to have your book, and more glad still to have a copy of it from you. Edwin Palmer sent me a copy two or three months ago. I have not read it yet, reserving it as a treat for my sea life, which begins again now in about ten days. I wish I could write to you fully about these Melanesian languages. I don’t know enough of them to write briefly, and I don’t want to take up your time. Gabelentz has sent me his Grammar. I am in communication with him. He is on the right track, and has done a great deal with exceedingly scanty materials.

‘The division usually made between Polynesian and Melanesian dialects is an arbitrary one. It is true that east of the Fiji group the Polynesian language is met with in a much purer form than in the West Pacific, but Fiji is more than half Polynesian; its structure almost wholly so; and the Polynesian element is carried, to my certain knowledge, through all the Banks Islands and all the New Hebrides, and it comes out very clearly in several of the Solomon group; and I found it well developed the other day when I first landed at Ysabel, and found that I could talk somewhat to the people after a short time.

‘I believe I might say almost as much of the Santa Cruz Archipelago, but I don’t know as much. The Loyalty Islands contain but few affinities with the Polynesian. I don’t mean to say that these dialects cannot be classified by one who knows a little of philology; I could prove it to you, if you were here, in five minutes, I am sure; and I am satisfied that if a man had the ability and knowledge of all the dialects, he could reconstruct the original language, or something very near it, just as one puts together a child’s puzzle. Practically, till one knows a good many of them, they of course appear to be, and have to be learnt as, separate unconnected languages; the difference of dialect being often very wide.

‘What an indication of the jealousy and suspicion of their lives the extraordinary multiplicity of these languages affords! In each generation, for aught I know, they diverge more and more; provincialisms and local words, &c., perpetually introduce new causes of perplexity.

‘Well, enough of this; and indeed I have no time to study these languages scientifically, so how can I write about them? I need not tell you that I heartily regret the blunder about the Sanskrit Professorship. From Sir Wm. Martin I have heard something of you; he met you, you may remember, at Oxford. If you can find time to send me a line, I shall be very glad; but I know you are much occupied.

‘I am, my dear Müller, very sincerely yours,

‘J. C. PATTESON, Missionary Bishop.’

When the Commemoration was over, the Max Müllers spent a fortnight in London, to see the Exhibition. They dined out constantly with their many friends. At a dinner at Mr. William Longman’s, a Frenchman who was of the party, and was particularly anxious to make Max Müller’s acquaintance, was overheard in the course of the evening to say, ‘I did not know a man so learned shall be so very young!’

TO MR. WILLIAM LONGMAN.

OXFORD, July 27.

‘I know that you will be glad to hear that my Lectures have just been awarded the Prix Volney by the French Academy. The prize is given for the best work on Comparative Philology, and it is open to all countries. The prize is only 1,200 francs, but it is very pleasant to have got it, and I hope it will help to sell the third edition.'

TO HIS WIFE.

LONDON, July 7.

'All I can say is that I have heard and read the worst that can be said against our religion—I mean the true original teaching of Christ; and I feel that I am ready in mind, if not in body, to lay down my life for the truth of His teaching. All our difficulties arise from the doctrines of men, not from His doctrine. There is no outward evidence of the truth of His doctrine, but the Spirit of God that is within us. He testifieth to its truth. If it does not, we are not yet disciples of Christ, but we may be hereafter. But more of that later. Be certain of this, that to repress a doubt is to repress the spirit of truth; a doubt well spoken out is generally a doubt solved. Only all this requires great seriousness of mind—it must assume an importance greater than anything else in life, and then we can fight our way through it. God is with us in our struggles.'

TO REV. CHARLES KINGSLEY.

August.

'Ranke (The Popes, &c.) is staying here for a week, and very anxious to make your acquaintance. Could you come here for a day to see him? He dines with us next Saturday, but any other day will do. Next Monday Ewald will be here; he has been here for a fortnight, but comes back all the way from Penrith to see Stanley. If our spare room is occupied (we expect the Walronds), we can always get you a bed close by. I think you would like Ewald—more even than Ranke.'

Ewald's visit has been fully described in the Autobiography, and the way he was cross-examined by some of the younger M.A.'s. He was a most lovable old man in private intercourse, though a fiery opponent of anything like political tyranny. His power of work was almost phenomenal: he would spend the whole day at the Bodleian, moving across to the Camera when the great library closed, sometimes returning there again after a late dinner. Canon Farrar records an incident of this visit of Ewald to Oxford:—

'Ranke and Ewald were both in Oxford in the middle of the Long Vacation. I determined to ask them to dinner together, though I dreaded a little friction between them, of Göttingen versus Berlin, and of Theology versus Modern History. I asked Canon Stanley and Müller to meet them. It was due to Müller's extreme tact that conversation was kept up and yet friction avoided. Ranke, oddly enough, had his head full of the probable danger to be apprehended in reference to European politics from Servia and Bulgaria (which afterwards proved true), and we could not get him to talk with interest on anything else. Müller showed his cleverness and shrewd common sense by imparting a vein of humour to the conversation, which prevented a painful outburst of disagreement; for Müller had a vein of true humour. It was not sallies of wit, abrupt outbursts of the comic, but a playful fun which flowed like a purling brook, intertwining itself with conversation, and which put crooked spirits in harmony.

'I have already implied that Müller had remarkable powers of conversation: he was always lively and always instructive. His mastery of English, both in voice and pronunciation, and of purity of style in writing, was a marvel. To this ought to be added a pellucid clearness of exposition and description, even in most abstract subjects, which is seen to some extent in his German tracts as well as more conspicuously in his English writings. His syntax was so free from entanglement, and his language so forceful and expressive, that no reader had to halt to ask himself the meaning of what he read.'

It was in the course of the summer that Max Müller received an interesting account from Dr. Martin Haug, director of Sanskrit studies at the College of Poona, of a great assembly of Brahmin Pundits held outside the town, in order to correct their MSS. of the Rig-veda by the three first published volumes of his great edition. The Pundits would not touch the books themselves, as the printing made them impure, an idea having got abroad that cows' blood was used in mixing the ink employed. But they sat in solemn conclave for some days, and Max Müller's carefully prepared text was read aloud, and the MSS. corrected by it. 'Their judgement,' says Dr. Haug, 'is to this effect. This edition must be written by a great Pundit versed in the Vedas and Sâstras (veda-sâstra sampanum), the highest title of honour of a learned man in India.' Dr. Haug then speaks of the difficulty of getting trustworthy copies of ancient Sanskrit MSS. 'Not that there are no good MSS. existing, but they are to be found generally in the possession of rich superstitious Brâhmans, who do not admit Europeans to their libraries, and when copies are made for Sahibs, they are made intentionally bad and incomplete. One of my Brâhman friends told me this the other day.'

The following letter is the first of a correspondence which was carried on till within a few months of Mr. Gladstone's death. An ardent Liberal from his University days, Max Müller was a great admirer of Mr. Gladstone, and a member of his Oxford committees till his rejection by the University in 1865. But Max Müller could not follow Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule policy, and was a determined Unionist, a Liberal Unionist, and in the contests in the borough of Oxford voted 'blue' for the last ten years of his life, though his deep respect for Mr. Gladstone's intellectual gifts, and the spell cast by his personality, remained in full force to the last.

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

64, HIGH STREET, September 7, 1862.

'MY DEAR SIR,—I beg to thank you for your kind letter. It was a true gratification to me to hear that my Lectures have attracted your attention, and that on the whole you approved of them. I am fully and painfully aware of the many and doubtful points in them, but I am quite satisfied if I have only succeeded in engaging the interest of a few thoughtful scholars in favour of a science which I feel convinced has still to teach us many important lessons. The sooner my book is superseded by a better one the better. I hope next spring to give a new series of lectures on the same subject, and intend then to enter more fully into the relation between Language and Thought, particularly in ancient times. One of the most important fields where the influence of language on thought—the Tartar's bow, as Bacon calls it—has been at work, is Ancient Mythology, but at the same time nothing is so beset with difficulties as the scientific analysis of mythological names. They belong to a very primitive stratum of language, and are full of anomalies; yet even these anomalies point to laws which determine their formation. Until these laws are discovered, until we can account for every letter, whether radical or formative, in the names of the Arian gods, all guesses at their original conception must be checked. It is almost a truism, but nevertheless a very important truth in the Science of Language, that the first meaning of every word is its etymological meaning. That meaning may grow and change, it may shift to the opposite pole of the compass; yet, if we want to know the first impulse which led to the formation of certain names and notions—of nomina or numina—the only answer, if any, must be given by etymology. Now as to the name of Ares to which you refer in your letter, I confess that I know nothing at all satisfactory as to its etymology. I cannot find out (1) whether **Αρης* shows any signs of an initial digamma, viz. whether the root from which it is derived began with a semi-vowel or with a vowel; (2) I am puzzled by the accent of **Αρης*, for in adjectives in ης the accent is generally on the last; (3) I am perplexed by the declension, where, as far as I know, no crasis ever takes place in the gen. εος, &c. Till these difficulties are removed, it is impossible to fix on any etymology, or rather, I should say, no etymology can be satisfactory which does not account for all these anomalies. I think it was in your book on Homer that I read the last account of Ares (I have not got it by me to-day), but I have no doubt that you are right in representing Ares as a Thracian god. The coincidence between Aria as the name of Thrace and Ares is therefore curious. But how are the two words to be reconciled? If Ares shows traces of an initial digamma it could not come from the root from which we have Aria; nor could Ares be an adjective or other derivative of Aria. I know of no god named originally from a country, rather are the names of countries derived from the names of gods. But again in this case **Αρης* would never lead to **Αρια*, it would be **Αρεια*. These are nothing but doubts and misgivings, and I have nothing else to say on the subject, but as to ἄρην its etymology is clear. It has the initial digamma and is identical with the Sanskrit vriṣhan. **Ἀήρ* again is, I believe, the Sanskrit nara or nṛi, man. In Greek words there is frequently a vowel prefixed to an initial N, D, L, Bh; for instance:—

Sk. nâman, name, ὄνομα.

Sk. nakha, nail, ὄνυξ.

Sk. bhrû, brow, ὄφρυσ.

Sk. navan, nine, ἐννέα.

Sk. rudhira, red, ερυθρός.

Sk. laghu, light, ελαχύς.

I confess I know of no instance where in Greek an a is prefixed to an initial η; it is always ε or ο, but we find a before s, in

Sk. star, Engl. star, ἀστήρ (stella = sterula).

Whatever therefore may be the etymology of Ares, ἄρην and ἄνῆρ point to two distinct roots, and neither of these would yield a satisfactory explanation of Ares. I should have answered your note before, but I had promised to send the MS. of the fourth volume of my edition of the Veda to the Press by Saturday night, and I had to work from morning till evening to keep my promise. I hope you will excuse the delay of my answer, and I only regret that it is so little satisfactory. Believe me to be, my dear sir, your obedient servant and sincere admirer.'

The fourth volume of the Rig-veda was now finished. The preface had required long and careful work, as Max Müller had to answer various criticisms on his Ancient Sanskrit Literature, and the dates he had there assigned to the Hymns of the Rig-veda; Wilson and Whitney agreeing in considering these limits as too narrow, whilst other critics considered them too wide. In his preface therefore Max Müller felt it necessary to enter fully into the question as to whether the age of the Vedic Hymns could be fixed by astronomical evidence—and this led to the further question whether the Indian Nakshatras or divisions of the heavens into twenty-seven equal parts were of Indian origin, or derived from a foreign country; a controversy which had been carried on with some acrimony, Biot the great astronomer claiming to have proved the Chinese origin of the Nakshatras, in which he was supported by Lassen.

The theory which now counts the greatest number of supporters attributes to the Nakshatras a Babylonian origin, whence they spread eastward to both Hindus and Chinese. Max Müller in his preface tried to establish the Indian origin of the Nakshatras, and adds some valuable notes from Professor Donkin and Mr. Main, the Radcliffe Observer, giving the positions of the moon and planets 1424 B.C. All this was reprinted as a separate pamphlet under the title of Ancient Hindu Astronomy and Chronology. He further defends himself against various critics who complained that he 'did not enter into all the controverted points, the theories, guesses, doubts, assertions, and counter-assertions of various scholars,' and assures them that he did not shrink from the trouble of examining them, but that he believed it 'to be our duty to learn to distinguish between what is important and what is not. We only retard the discovery of truth by entering into every bypath on the right and on the left. The straight line is always the best, the simplest machinery the most perfect. If we can prove our point without a great apparatus of so-called learning, it is our duty to do so. He sweeps cleanest that makes the least dust.'

Max Müller apologizes for the delay in bringing out this volume in these words:—

‘For a time it was doubtful whether the funds necessary for the completion of the Rig-veda would be provided. This caused uncertainty and delay. When I resumed my work, my time was no longer my own, and there were more urgent occupations which left me but scant leisure for the prosecution of my Sanskrit studies. Had I been allowed to devote, I do not say the whole, but at least one-half of my time to the study of Sanskrit and the carrying on of my edition of the Rig-veda, the present volume would have been published long ago. The MSS. of the Commentary of Sâyana are very inferior for these later portions, the number of passages hopelessly corrupt and imperfect is constantly increasing. There is many a short line in these notes which represents the results of hours, nay of days and weeks of hard work.’

Max Müller again acknowledges the help given him by Dr. Aufrecht, who, though he had long ceased to be his secretary, had been living on in Oxford. The preface contains a warm tribute to the memory of Professor Wilson: ‘Wilson had lived through almost the whole history of Sanskrit scholarship, and had taken part in nearly every important work that marked an epoch in the study of Indian literature, history, and religion. Every one of his own works represents a new conquest. He never followed, he was always first.’ Finally, in dwelling on the translation of the Rig-veda, begun by Wilson, to be carried on by Ballantyne, Max Müller points out the great difficulty of making a thoroughly clear translation of the whole:—

‘Some portions, I confess, I consider as hopeless, as likely to resist all attempts at interpretation, but there is no reason to despair. The Rig-veda is the most ancient book of the Aryan world. Every Hymn, every verse, every word that can be deciphered in it is a gain. These Hymns represent the lowest stratum in the growth of the human mind that can be reached anywhere by means of contemporaneous literature.’

Max Müller was so thoroughly exhausted by the summer’s work, that he found it necessary to get a change before term. He and his wife went for a fortnight to Tenby, which he thoroughly enjoyed, visiting Manorbier, Carew, Pembroke, and other ruins with keen interest, and searching for sea animals for his aquarium in Oxford with the zest of a boy. On their way back a visit was paid to a relative near Swansea, where the large copper-works of his wife's family were inspected with great interest, Max Müller particularly enjoying the part-singing of the men employed at the works, during their dinner hour. He had not heard Welsh singing and voices before, and was much struck with the natural and national turn for music, as a strong contrast to the absence of it in the English labourer and artisan.

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

December 14.

‘I will not let the old year slip past without once more shaking hands with you—as well as it is possible from this great distance. It is so long since I heard from you, or from any of my German friends. I am afraid it may be my fault. I wanted to finish the fourth volume of my Veda, and so I could not find time for anything else, nor did I think of anything else. But now I have finished, and I feel like a snake that has just cast her skin, and is now going forth for further prey. In the new Germany I see no sign of life, and I doubt whether we shall live to see what our fathers hoped for, realized. Uhland, one of the last noble, faithful, patriotic men, had been hoping for so long, but he too has been called away without having lived to see the morning dawn. When I think of Bunsen in 1848, and of his sure, prophetic hopes! and he too is gone, and owls sit in the eagle's nest which he had built up here in London. Here in England we possess personal and political freedom, and that is such a blessing—it is like the fresh sea-air, but it is habeas corpus, not habeas animus. The spiritual struggle proceeds slowly, and the dogged resistance is great, and the passion of persecution would do honour to the sixteenth century. Bishop Colenso appeals to the English mercantile understanding; it makes more impression than all that tastes of mind.

‘The book will amuse you. Jowett has somewhat retired, and is at work at his edition of Plato's Republic. Stanley fights very bravely; he has just published Lectures on the Jewish Church, first series, which produce an effect in England, but will hardly be appreciated in Germany.

‘Pattison sits still, says little, but thinks so much. His young wife is a little too young for him, I am afraid, but he is well and of good cheer. To-morrow night there will be some acting at his house in the College! How is your work getting on, and what are your plans for the future? Shall we meet anywhere next year? I hope to go to Germany next summer, but before that I have to give a course of lectures in London, about the material and spiritual element in Language. My old lectures are appearing now in a German translation, also Italian and French translations are to appear, and I am reproduced in America. I hope the next volume will be an improvement, but whether people will like it is another question.

'How I wish you could see my home here in Oxford! I wish indeed for no better. I have altogether given up having any wishes at all, and I enjoy the most beautiful happiness which life has to offer—a good wife and two healthy children.

'Aufrecht is Professor in Edinburgh, happily married to a pretty, cultured wife with independent means; he writes most happily, and the sunshine has driven away the old clouds of envy and suspicion. In old friendship.'

The Christmas was spent at Ray Lodge, but very quietly, for the awful distress in Lancashire, owing to the 'cotton famine' caused by the American War, weighed on all hearts and all purses. Superfluous luxuries were cut off in almost every household, and except a tiny Christmas tree for the children, there were no presents, all money that could be spared going weekly to the fund for the thousands starving in the North from no fault of their own.

By the middle of January Max Müller was quietly settled again in Oxford, and busy with the preparation of the second course of lectures on 'The Science of Language' for the Royal Institution. His course of lectures this term in Oxford were on 'Bopp's Comparative Grammar.' Towards the close of the month he heard that the fourth volume of the Rig-veda, the first dedicated to the Queen, had been received at Osborne, and that 'Her Majesty appreciated the learning and erudition that must have been employed in its production, and that it and the three first volumes sent at the same time (beautifully bound in morocco and gold) would form a valuable addition to the Royal Library.' Soon after he heard from his old friend and teacher Professor Brockhaus in Leipzig: 'Your Lectures on the Science of Language have, as you know, found many admirers here, and every one is looking forward to your new volume.'

The London lectures were even more crowded than the first course. Max Müller found them more fatiguing, for the course was longer, and he went up and down from Oxford, only sleeping in London if engaged to dine out. Towards the close of the course he delivered a Friday evening lecture on 'The Vedas,' to an enormous audience, people sitting on every step of the staircases, and standing in the gangways. This lecture was repeated in substance two years later at Leeds, and will be found in the first edition of Chips, Volume I.

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

OXFORD, March 3, 1863.

'What you say about the German translation is just what I feel. I have not wished for a translation, but cannot prevent it being done, and therefore have to leave the rest to the judgement of the publisher. In no case should I undertake to write differently for Germany than for England. My manner of writing may look learned or unlearned, that is the same to me. I know it costs more labour to think out a subject so that it can be clearly stated, than to bring it to light half digested and with all its threads entangled. I work for no class in particular, nor for a definite purpose, and I recognize only one duty which renders our work responsible, i.e. the promoting of truth; and nothing is true which is not perfectly clear. There are some hard nuts hidden in my lectures, the cracking of which has tried the teeth of some obscure scholars; but the honest ones among them will confess this, and will gratefully accept the cleanly peeled kernel. I could have made an immense noise, had I cracked all my hard nuts before the public, and many empty ones might have been mixed up with them without the readers noticing it. But that sort of thing I consider wrong, and I shall never be infected by the aristocratic arrogance of scholars. I can well believe, that if I had written five unreadable volumes instead of one small volume, the sale in Germany would have been more rapid.

'What I have worked out may be good or bad, but each cultivated man, be he an Englishman or a Kaffir, knows what I am driving at and how matters stand. That was not always the case with Bunsen. With all respect for his knowledge, his proofs were not always absolutely convincing, firm or healthy. But I am quite prepared to see my translation abused in Germany; never mind, failure with an honest conscience is better than success with a sacrifice of what one really thinks. If you want to read obscure books about language, read Humboldt, or should you wish to read obscure, superficial books, read Steinthal, &c., &c. How such things can be endured in Germany, I do not understand, and I expect no political or religious freedom till the literary cobwebs are swept away. Now, you will say, "Lion, you have roared effectively!" [Löwe, gut gebrüllt!], but I think we understand each other in spite of it all. I have not yet seen Bunsen's Letters, but I will try to get them. I sit here toiling away at the Veda, and feel heartily tired of the whole business. In faithful love.'

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, March 14.

'I shall live this week like a hermit and try to get on with my lectures. You see, I must work hard, for that is what we are all meant to do, and though it may seem to deprive us of some of the enjoyment of life, it really increases real happiness; it makes one feel that one does not live for nothing, and one enjoys one's holidays with a much stouter heart. I hope our summer will be a very happy one, but till then there is still a good deal of work to be gone through.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, March, 1863.

'I live in one perpetual trot, and shall be glad when my lectures in London are over. In the summer I will amuse myself. If I can get away early in June I think of going with G. to Paris; the middle of July I must return for the examination of the Indian civilians, which lasts a fortnight. When that is over we shall go to Germany. But I must have good air, so I think we will meet you in Dresden, and all go together to the Lake of Geneva, for I feel in myself that I want bracing, and Dresden does not do for that. I only grieve that we shall thus see so little of Augusta and Krug. Our great difficulty is about the children. The little one certainly must not go—the doctor forbids it—so the question is about Ada. I don't think I could bear to be so long without her, nor G. either, and yet the long journey is not good at her age. We discuss it every day, and can come to no decision. I can make no fixed plan yet, I am so overpowered with work; but I hope all will be as we wish, and that we may enjoy the summer happily together.'

TO PROFESSOR TYNDALL.

OXFORD, March 14.

'Accept my best thanks for your kind help in providing me with a most excellent Siren for my lecture yesterday. My audience seemed delighted with it, though I am sorry to say it took up more of my time than I had to spare. I shall have to finish my lecture next Saturday, but I shall not trouble you either for the Siren or for any other experiment, as I must get on with my subject, and cannot afford any more amusements. I am much pleased with Helmholtz's book, and should give a great deal to be able to hear your lectures on "Sound," and to see some of the experiments which, though so well described by Helmholtz, are yet imperfect and unsatisfactory on paper.

'Do you not think that if our scales were properly constructed, all harmonies would be necessarily harmonious, and not inharmonious, as they now are after the 7th?'

Easter was spent at Ray Lodge, with many old friends staying in the house, who all 'enjoyed Müller's music,' says a contemporary Diary.

TO HIS WIFE.

April 7.

'When I ordered your fly, I found Mrs. — in great distress: her baby had died on Sunday quite suddenly. I went to see the little child, and it looked so calm and peaceful, and yet that poor mother would have given her very life to have had that little soul back. It was heartrending to see her, and I could give her but little comfort, but it was a solemn sight. What a small line it is that separates us and all that we love here from that life which waits for us, and why should we be so unwilling to go home, for here our home is not, and the great wrench must come, and happy are those who have passed through it. Yet when I looked on that little child that had been playing about but a few days ago, and then thought of our little darlings, I felt it must be fearful to part with them, if one did not feel that a happier life is in store for them than what they would have found here. And with all this misery going on everywhere, one lives on and laughs and takes it all as a matter of course, whereas if one looks into life as it is, one wonders how one can ever forget it again, and ever care again for the littlenesses of which our pleasures and our pride consist here. Ernst ist das Leben, so says the German proverb, and very true it is.'

It was at this time that Max Müller first met with Sir George Cox's admirable books on mythology. Sir George seems to have sent him The Tales of Thebes and Argos, and the following letter is the beginning of a correspondence on Comparative Mythology, spread over many years. The editor owes these letters to Sir George Cox to the kindness of the Rev. R. W. Rees of Manchester, into whose hands they had passed.

TO REV. G. COX.

RAY LODGE, April 16, 1863.

'DEAR SIR,— . . . I was delighted when reading your Tales<sup>1</sup>, and I feel convinced that in the form in which you have given them these myths are nearer to what they originally were than in any of the works of the mythographer, whether ancient or modern. I never felt so strongly that on the whole the principles of Comparative Mythology are right than when I saw them applied as you have applied them. I do not despair that we shall discover and disentangle many more of the complicated myths of the Aryan nations, though I know but too well that the ground is treacherous and requires great caution. Yours with sincere regard,

'MAX MÜLLER.'

The end of April Max Müller went to London as one of the deputation from the University of Oxford, to present the address of congratulation to the Prince of Wales on his marriage. The Prince of Wales graciously promised to honour his Alma Mater with his presence at Commemoration, accompanied by the Princess. As is the custom on such occasions, His Royal Highness sent in the names of those whom he desired should receive the honorary degree of D.C.L. Among these appeared the name of Charles Kingsley, one of the Prince's chaplains. At once Dr. Pusey opposed the degree in Council, on the ground that Hypatia, Mr. Kingsley's finest work, was immoral. Charles Kingsley's friends, among whom may be mentioned Dr. Stanley, Dr. Rolleston, and Max Müller, were very indignant, and the day that the name was finally to be voted on in Council, Dr. Stanley appeared armed with a copy of Hypatia borrowed from Max Müller, which still has all the passages marked in it, used by Dr. Stanley in opposing the Professor of Hebrew. But though the name might have been carried in Council, a vote of non placet was threatened in the Theatre, in the very presence of the Prince, and to avoid so scandalous a scene, Charles Kingsley's friends withdrew his name. A few days later Max Müller had a letter from Mrs. Kingsley which is given here by permission. In sending it on to his wife, who was away from home, Max says: 'I enclose an excellent letter from Mrs. Kingsley, for which she deserves more than a

<sup>1</sup> Of Thebes and Argos.

D.C.L. degree. I am curious to know how the Prince will take it, and I am only afraid that he will never know how badly people behaved.'

FROM MRS. KINGSLEY.

EVERSLEY RECTORY, Wednesday.

'MY DEAR MAX,—Charles is away at Whitchurch fishing, so he will not receive your most kind letter till to-morrow. I have written by this post to the Rollestons that they may fill up their rooms, merely saying that unavoidable circumstances will keep us at home on June 15, and I do hope they will not think us ungrateful and changeable. I have no doubt there is some wise reason for this great disappointment, and perhaps the great honour under all circumstances which we should have felt it to be, would have been very bad for us. It is so difficult to be perfectly single-minded, even in a little parsonage, that perhaps it is a great blessing to be saved the Theatre of Oxford, which may not be the best soil for the growth of such a virtue; and I am sure I longed too vehemently for the sight of my dear husband in a scarlet gown for it to have done me any good. Depend upon us both for not mentioning the subject. It will always be associated with the pleasant and grateful remembrance of your kindness, dear Max, and Dr. Stanley's, and I shall try hard to let it obliterate Dr. Pusey and his Christian hatred. Oh! it is a great mercy to live in a parsonage remote from courts and courtiers, and even doctors of divinity. Best love to dearest G. and delicious Ada. Yours ever affectionately,

'F. E. KINGSLEY.'

Early in June the Max Müllers went to Paris, leaving their children at Ray Lodge. Here they passed a delightful month in constant intercourse with many of the most distinguished members of the literary world of Paris, a world that all along kept entirely aloof from the brilliant but evil Court of Louis Napoleon. One evening was spent with the Mohls, Madame Mohl still keeping up on a smaller scale the Salon of the earlier part of the century. On this occasion Madame Mohl, who was about to start for her annual visit to London, amused her guests by parading all the bonnets she had provided for her expedition, and trying them on, one after another. Only those who remember Madame Mohl's quaint, almost bizarre, appearance can imagine the droll effect as one by one the smart Parisian bonnets were essayed, and the verdict of her guests, male and female, eagerly expected.

Renan's house too was often visited, with its rooms hung with some of the best portraits by Ary Scheffer, Madame Renan being his niece, daughter of Henri Scheffer, whose fine portrait occupied a conspicuous place. Max Müller attended the meetings at the Institute as a corresponding member, and he and his wife were both present the day that M. Mignet pronounced the éloge on Lord Macaulay. It was a fine scene; the hall surmounted by its great dome was well filled by the members of the Institute, all wearing the beautiful habit brodé chosen by Richelieu, and ladies in the gayest of summer dresses. Mignet's melodious voice sounded clearly through the vast assemblage, and his words were so distinctly pronounced, they were like words cut out of marble, whilst it was a pleasure to watch each movement of his singularly beautiful mouth. The oration itself was magnificent.

The following letter must be about this date:—

TO REV. F. (NOW DEAN) FARRAR.

‘MY DEAR SIR,—I am so sorry that we can never meet in peace and exchange views: letters and books are cumbersome ways of mutual explanation, and I do not know how it is that I can never bring myself to believe that people hold different views on matters accessible to scientific treatment, unless for some reason or other they wish to do so. When I read your books I can fully enter into all you mean, and yet I do not feel the least disturbed in my own views. Our real differences refer to facts, and these fortunately are amenable to scientific tests. In my lectures, as you say quite rightly, I have not said half of what I meant to say, perhaps what I ought to have said. It did not seem to me the place for it. But I mean to give another lecture specially on the Antiquity of Language, and then you, or at all events your friends, will be surprised to see how little we differ, although we seem to be diametrically opposed. I could have explained this to you in half an hour of conversation, but I cannot do it by letter, and I shudder at controversy, and have had that horror all my life.’

After three weeks in England for examination work, Max Müller and his wife started for Germany, leaving both of their children behind. They stopped at Bonn to see Baroness Bunsen and Professor Bernays, but Max Müller was again disappointed in making his intimate friend acquainted with his wife, as it was the time of the Black Fast, the fall of Jerusalem; and Bernays could not go anywhere, and only saw Max Müller for about an hour. After joining his mother at Chemnitz, and taking her and his sister with them to Leipzig and Dessau, the Max Müllers went on to Berlin to see Max's friend Morier, and whilst there were commanded to Potsdam to dine with the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia. Nothing could exceed the kindness with which they were received, though the visit was shorter than had been intended by the royal hosts, as the Crown Prince had been suddenly summoned to Gastein, where the King and Bismarck were taking the waters. On arriving the guests were driven about the park till the two o'clock dinner. It was intensely hot weather, and the dinner was in the open air. Afterwards the royal children were brought in by their English nurses: Princess Charlotte of Saxe-Meiningen, the present Emperor, and Prince Henry, hardly a year old, to play round the table, and talk to the English guests. The sight of this happy family life made a deep impression on the visitors. A few days later the Crown Princess wrote, through Countess Brühl, to say what pleasure it had been to receive the Max Müllers in her own home. Things at that time were at an unhappy pass in Prussia. Old Professor Bopp mentioned to Max Müller, as a mere on dit, something about the Court which had appeared as a fact two months before in the English Times, adding, 'It is impossible here to find out the truth'; and in one of the confidential talks that Max had with his Paris friend von Schlötzer when they were alone, for in public it was not safe to talk of politics, von Schlötzer said, 'I would give anything to be English for a day, to know what political freedom means.'

From Berlin, Max Müller and his wife went by Nuremberg and Munich to Leoni on the Starnberger See, taking his mother and his eldest niece with them. Here a delightfully quiet month was passed in a comfortable pension close to the lovely lake, where they bathed and rowed constantly, taking long walks in the beautiful country round. From the higher ground behind the house they could see the snow-covered mountains to the south of the lake. One scene deserves to be recalled. The Vocal Club (Sänger-Verein) from Munich came out for the day, and gave an open-air concert on the summit of a hill crowned with pine woods that rose over the lake. It was a picturesque sight, the gay banners, the club members in their many-coloured scarves, and the groups of peasants in their national costumes—the men in high hats, and their coats covered with large silver buttons; the women with their bright petticoats, and black bodices with gold or silver embroidery, with chains and earrings of gold or silver, and small black caps with embroidery to match. The part-singing was beautiful, the voices rich and melodious in themselves, and the expression and light and shade carefully observed. Of course there was plenty of eating and drinking, and at last dancing, but, though all seemed very free and easy, there was no rudeness, nothing objectionable in the gathering.

From Leoni the mother and niece returned to Chemnitz, the Max Müllers going across the Brenner to Italy. It was their first taste of Italy, after which Max had, he tells us, hankered all his life. Venice especially was like a dream realized, though the sight of the Austrian soldiers everywhere roused his indignation. It was found on visiting the Doge's Palace that many of the best pictures were being cleaned. One that he particularly desired to see—Venezia trionfante, by Paul Veronese—was not to be seen, and he was lamenting it one day to the old Italian librarian, a true patriot, who, when he found a kindred soul in Max Müller, not only in books but in politics, had many a talk with him on the state of Venice. At his last visit Max Müller said he looked forward to coming again to Italy, adding significantly, 'And then I hope to see Venezia trionfante!' At their next visit it was so, but the old librarian had passed away, though he lived long enough to see his beloved city free from the hated foreigner. The travellers returned by Turin and the Italian Lakes, the St. Gothard, where the first snows had fallen, and which they crossed on foot, and rapidly through Switzerland to England.

Max Müller's lectures began as soon as he returned to Oxford, and he was as usual overwhelmed with letters on all subjects.

TO REV. G. COX.

OXFORD, November 4.

‘I was not at Oxford when Dr. Pusey preached his last sermon. I have not read it, nor have I heard any remarks about it. But I can quite understand the impression which it made on you.

‘There are not a few points on which Dr. Pusey’s ideas have become perfectly hardened : one cannot reason with him about them, nor is he able himself to handle them. They have become fixed ideas—they do not bend, but threaten to crack.

‘With all that, I have a strong personal regard for Dr. Pusey. He is a man of great learning and a vast experience of life, in fact, one of the two or three interesting men at Oxford. Besides that, he has always shown me great kindness, though he knows my opinions, and though in University matters we have had fierce fights together. In spite of that, and though we were hardly on speaking terms at the time of the election for the Sanskrit Professorship, he offered me his help unasked, he sat up day and night (in the literal meaning of the words) writing letters to his friends—whereas my liberal friends, for whom I had worked hard on several occasions, did hardly anything for me, and some of them, on whom I thought I had claims, failed me altogether. Stanley and Pusey were my chief supporters, and the only men who, I believe, felt for me when I failed to obtain that position in which I might have been really useful, and might have been able to finish the work of my life. However, I am not blind to the dangerous consequences of Pusey’s teaching. I consider his alliance with the Low Church as a most fatal mistake. But I look at all these things very much ab extra ; I keep entirely aloof of University politics, and I look more and more to Germany as my real home and the centre which attracts my interests. I shall stay in England to finish the work which brought me here, but I look forward to spending the last years of my life among my old friends in Germany.’

Max Müller had been invited in the spring to deliver two lectures at Edinburgh on ‘Language.’ He accepted the invitation to lecture, but begged that the lectures might be on ‘The Origin of Mythology.’ On November 9 he went to Edinburgh to deliver these two lectures at the Philosophical Institution.

TO HIS WIFE.

EDINBURGH, November 10.

‘One lecture safely over. I had an immense audience ; the place was as full as it could hold. Whether people were pleased or not

I don't know; they applauded and all that, but I think I aimed a little too high. There were all the Professors and learned men, however, and they seemed pleased; also Dr. John Brown, a charming man, of whom I shall see more.'

November 11.

'How thankful we ought to be every minute of our existence to Him who gives us all this richly to enjoy! How little one has deserved this happy life, much less than many poor sufferers to whom life is a burden and a hard and bitter trial. But then, how much greater the claims on us; how much more sacred the duty never to trifle, never to waste time and power, never to compromise, but to live in all things, small and great, to the praise and glory of God, to have God always present with us, and to be ready to follow His voice, and His voice only. Has our prosperity taught us to meet adversity when it comes? I often tremble, but then I commit all to God, and I say, "Have mercy upon me, miserable sinner!"'

'Let us keep up our constant fight against all that is small, and common, and selfish; let us never lose our faith in the ideal life, in what we ought to be, and in what, with constant prayer to God, we shall be.

'My work here will soon be over. We had a pleasant dinner to-night at Mr. Muir's. I had a drive in the afternoon with Dr. John Brown, a most charming, excellent man, with whom you would have been delighted. He is a good friend of Lady A. Bruce and of Stanley, and he thinks they are worthy of each other. I shall be glad when my lecture to-morrow is over. People are very civil and kind here. Prince Alfred sent me a message to say how sorry he was he could not come to my lectures, but that every one of his evenings had been engaged this week.'

The following description was sent at the time to a connexion of Max Müller's wife in London:—

'I went on Friday night to hear Max Müller on "The Origin of Mythology." It was most interesting. I never liked a lecture more. It required close attention, yet was quite clear and intelligible. He seemed to open new worlds, dim, half-revealed, mysterious, and this dimness gave a fascination—wide stretches of thought and conjecture retreating into darkness yet to be explored, when the Veda, "still with seven seals upon it," shall be adequately translated.

'His inquiry into the origin of the name of the Supreme Being—alike in Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, and Teutonic—was intensely interesting, and his manner was so reverential on these subjects.

'He looks quite young, and his manner and voice were most pleasant. The hall was crowded.'

TO REV. G. COX.

EDINBURGH, November 10.

‘Mythology no doubt springs from scattered tales, and to single tales it should be reduced before we attempt to explain it. This is what I thought so particularly happy in your books, that you should have told the tales singly, as they might have been told by any grandmother in any small village of Greece, long before the encyclopaedic treatment of Greek fables began. I have been trying my hand at something of the same kind in German, on the pattern of Grimm’s Märchen, but I have failed. The story of Oedipus has just been dissected by M. Michel Bréal very cleverly, though I doubt whether people will be convinced by it.

“Always the Sun, and always the Sun,” people exclaim, and yet it is not our fault if the Sun has inspired so many legends and received so many names. And what else do you expect at the bottom of mythology, if not the reflection of heaven and earth in the mind and language of man?’

TO THE SAME.

OXFORD, November 29.

‘... I cannot bring myself to enter into or to adopt Kuhn’s theory of clouds and thunderstorms being at the bottom of all Aryan mythology, a view which I see has just been strongly advocated by Mr. Kelle in his Indo-European Traditions. He gives a most incomplete representation of Kuhn’s labours. I should have thought that Grote had entirely dispelled the belief that there was any historical substratum in the legends of Troy, or at least any more than in the legends of Charlemagne taking Jerusalem, &c.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

*Translation.*OXFORD, November 28.

‘I must just tell you we are very well, though we get no rest. Last week a visit from Princess Helena and Princess Louise, to whom I had to show everything; last Wednesday a ball at the Duke of Marlborough’s, where G. and I danced in the beautiful library; and to-day a visit from the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia. They were with Dr. Stanley, and we went there for luncheon, and have been walking about with them till now. To-night a dinner, where we are to meet the Duc d’Aumale and Lord Lawrence, the Viceroy of India. Then next week I am ordered to Windsor to the Queen, then my lectures here—in fact, my head is in a whirl, and I am longing for rest. I am happiest when quiet with my children, who are darlings and thrive so well.’

Just before this letter to his mother, Max Müller was graciously commanded to Windsor for the first time. A day was named for him to go to luncheon: 'The Queen is anxious to see him,' and it was considerably added, 'if the day mentioned is not convenient to him another can be named.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 11.

'I was with the Queen for three-quarters of an hour, quite alone. Her Majesty received me in Prince Albert's room, and said she had long wished to see me, and hoped it would not be the last time, and then she talked in the most brilliant and interesting way, and spoke German better than I do. The Queen asked me to tell her about my work, spoke a good deal about Bunsen, about Prince Albert, about Schleswig-Holstein, and I could often hardly believe it was the Queen of England talking to me! The Crown Princess was not at Windsor, but sent for me on Tuesday, and we talked for an hour and a half. She too was most charming. The Princess soon returns to Berlin, which cannot be a pleasant place to her at present. She is a very remarkable woman, very liberal, and full of enthusiasm for Germany.'

TO REV. G. COX.

OXFORD, December 10.

'The Basque is a most interesting language to study as the type of an agglutinative form of speech, but though it agrees in form most strikingly with the Turanian language, the Finnic more particularly, no one has yet discovered any similarity between the natural elements of the Basque and any other language. How far the Basque was spoken in former days has been shown by Humboldt in his Essay on the Original Inhabitants of Spain, before him by Hernas. Michel's derivations of Basque words are copied from earlier writers, mostly theologians, who, in a language such as the Basque, easily found all that they looked for. They are worth nothing. If year was called inundation, this is no more than if we call year either spring, or autumn, or winter. But the Basque is a language which, in the hands of an unscrupulous philologist, will be made to say anything.'

On December 21 Max Müller writes to his mother: 'I am very much excited, for I have been commanded to Osborne to give some lectures before the Queen and the Princesses. The days are not fixed, but probably early in January.'

Christmas was spent at Ray Lodge, and then Max Müller went back alone to Oxford to prepare the royal lectures.

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, December 28.

‘Here I am at work, and getting on very well, I hope. I dine with Stanley to-night, to hear from him and Lady Augusta what to observe and what to avoid at Osborne. I am sorry to be away from you, but I feel I ought to do my very best, and I can write better when I am here alone and have all my books.’

To his mother he writes, December 30: ‘I go to Osborne on the third and stay till the sixth, so you can think of me.’

CHAPTER XIV

1864-1865

Lectures at Osborne. Schleswig-Holstein war. Birth of third child.
Member of Royal Irish Academy. Weymouth. Visit of his mother.
Lecture at Leeds. Member of Turin Academy. Last visit to Ray Lodge. Sub-Librarianship of Bodleian.

‘PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER had the honour of delivering two lectures last week at Osborne before Her Majesty and the Royal Family, on the Science of Language.’ Such was the announcement in the Court Circular, and the following letters give the details of this interesting visit :—

TO HIS WIFE.

OSBORNE, January 5.

‘I arrived here all safe. I met the Queen’s messenger at Southampton, and we went to Osborne in the Elfin, which had brought Prince Alfred over. The crossing took more than an hour, but I did not feel uncomfortable. I sat in the cabin with Prince Leiningen, who commands the vessel, and we had a pleasant chat together in German. I was very tired when I arrived here, and full of cold and headache, so I laid down in my own room, which was warm and cosy, and slept till dinner-time. I dined with the household at eight. I sat between Lady Churchill and Mrs. Ponsonby. All was very pleasant. Sir James Clarke was there, Mr. Ponsonby, Sir Thomas Biddulph, and some more ladies. After dinner we went to the ladies’ drawing-room, where a message arrived from the Queen, who wished to see me. So I was conducted into the royal portion of the palace, and in a small boudoir there were the Queen, Princess Hohenlohe, and Princess Helena : afterwards Mrs. Bruce came in. I did my best to talk sense, but oh ! my poor head. The Queen was very kind, and thanked me for coming, and said she was looking forward very much to my lectures. The conversation was in German, and you cannot imagine the dignity and graciousness of the Queen when she spoke with great composure of Prince Albert ; and the reports spread abroad about her state of health are absolutely absurd. After about twenty minutes the Queen bowed, and I went straight to bed. I feel much better to-day, and hope to get through my lecture without disgrace. I received a message that Princess Helena wished to walk with me in the afternoon. Then at six there is to be the lecture, diagrams and all. Prince Arthur will be there; he was kept a day longer on purpose. The palace is full of beautiful works of art, but I have hardly had time to look at them yet.'

January 6.

'My first lecture is over, and from all I can hear it has not been a failure. Yesterday in the afternoon I had a very pleasant walk with Princess Helena and Mrs. Bruce. Princess Helena showed me their private museum, which they keep in a Swiss cottage, full of curious things which have been given them, or which the Princes have collected in their foreign travels. There were the Queen's former playthings, and a kitchen where the Princesses cook and bake, and kitchen gardens, one for each of them, and the Princess Royal every year gets her green peas from her own plot sent to Berlin, and enjoys them greatly. Everything is full of recollections of the Prince, and they all talk about him as if he were still among them. This is thoroughly German, and it always struck me in England how carefully all conversation on those who have gone before us is avoided, and how much of comfort and good influence derived from the memory of those we loved is thereby lost. After we came home from our walk, I had just time to prepare for my lecture, and to get my diagrams mounted. At six all the people assembled in the Council Chamber, and after a time came the Queen and the Princesses. The Queen had not attended a lecture for more than ten years, and everybody was surprised at her appearing. She listened very attentively, and did not knit at all, though her work was brought. After the lecture the Queen conversed with me for a long time, asking many shrewd questions, as did her sister, Princess Hohenlohe. It was then time to dress for dinner, and then to bed. This morning I had an interview with Princess Beatrice, who however was a little shy at first, but became after a time very amusing. She talks English, French, and German.'

January 6, 11 p.m.

'Just to finish the account of my visit here, I must tell you that after I had sent my letter to you to-day, the Queen sent for me again to her drawing-room, and brought Princess Beatrice with her to make her read to me in German, English, and French. She did it remarkably well, and the Queen talked to me a good deal about education, and how she taught her children. Afterwards Princess Helena showed me all the family pictures by Winterhalter, and the splendid statues. The Princess, when you know her, reminds you much of the Princess Royal. We walked about for a long time discussing all sorts of things. I had then to prepare for my lecture, to which the Queen came again, but without any work at all. In the evening Lord Granville arrived, and the Queen was very busy. She sent me word she hoped to see me, but afterwards sent to say it was getting too late, and that she was sorry she could not have seen me, and thanked me again. In the evening I had a long talk with Lord Granville, and to-morrow morning I hope to start at 9.30 with Prince Arthur and Sir James Clarke.'

These are the concluding words of the last lecture:—

'When the two last volumes of the Veda are published we shall have saved from destruction a work older than the Iliad, older than any other literary document of that noble race of mankind to which the greatest nations in the world's history have belonged—a race which after receiving from a Semitic race, from the Jews, its best treasure, its religion, the religion of the Old and New Testaments, is now, with the English in the van, carrying on slowly but irresistibly the conquest of the world by means of commerce, colonization, education, and conversion.'

On Max Müller's return, he heard from Sir Charles Phipps how pleased the Queen had been with the lectures—'of that you must be fully aware'—and Sir Charles added how much he had himself valued the information and instruction communicated, whilst three days later Lady Augusta Stanley forwarded the following extract from a letter from Princess Helena, now Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein. Gracious permission has been given to insert it.

'We have had two most interesting and charming lectures from Professor Max Müller. I cannot tell you how much I enjoyed them and value them. Do tell him so when you see him again, and how much I regret not being able to hear any more. I wish there was a possibility of my hearing more at some future time; I hope so—and Mama has not said No! You cannot think how pleasant it was for me to be able to talk to a clever man like Professor M. and one who does not inspire me with fear, as some very learned people do. The subject he treats is one which always interested me so much. Ever with much love, your affectionate friend, 'HELENA.'

TO REV. G. COX.

OXFORD, January 22.

'... When the Rishis first perceived the necessity of one Superior Power is difficult to say. It breaks through here and there, but their religion does not become monotheistic, for this involves the denial of polytheism. It always remains henotheistic, if one may coin such a word. I mean the one single god addressed at the time shares in all the qualities of a supreme being, but soon after another god is addressed equally supreme, and their logic does not in the least revolt at this. The Etruscan names of Greek deities have about the same value as the English names of the Indian deities. I mean they are mere corruptions, partly owing to ignorance, partly to the imperfections of the Etruscan alphabet, which possessed no media, and despised vowels almost as much as the Semitic languages.'

TO THE SAME.

January 26.

' . . . Much as I admire M. Bréal's essay on Cacus, I do not the least feel convinced by his explanation of the dualism between Ormuzd and Ahriman, nor by his theory of Persian influences to be discovered in the early portions of the Bible. I am as far from prejudices on this point as M. Bréal, who is a Jew, and who, like most educated Jews, looks upon the books of the Old Testament as much more than inspired—taking inspired in the modern sense of that word—namely, as real, old, historical documents. I should value any such traces of influences received from neighbouring nations by the writers of the Old Testament most highly; but such is the importance from an historical point of view that I shall not feel inclined to build any conclusions on such vague evidence as that brought together by M. Bréal. . . . Any such word as Asdossodeus, if it could be discovered in the early books, would be invaluable, but though I do not give up all hope of such discoveries hereafter, I am bound to say that as yet I cannot see them.'

TO THE SAME.

February 16.

'I am afraid I have hardly done justice to your book in my review. The fact is, I was overwhelmed with work, and, after a short introduction, I put in a portion of my lectures which I am preparing for the Press. However, I find that my article has at least startled several people who have a tender feeling for Helen and Troy, and I hope they will take to your book and try to get some more information. I may be wrong in my explanation of the relation between Helen and Paris, Saramâ and Pavi, but I cannot help thinking that Helena and Saramâ are the same word.'

The following letter refers first to Mr. Gifford Palgrave, the Arabian traveller, who had just returned from his daring expedition, and then to the Schleswig-Holstein question, which occupied so much of Max Müller's attention during the early part of this year.

TO HIS WIFE.

February 17.

'After luncheon I went to see the Jesuit, and had a very interesting talk with him about a thousand subjects. I found him clever, well-informed, and devoted to his work; quite unanglicized, however, in all his views, and strangely torn away from all the fibres of his native soil. It is a pleasant contrast to the self-seeking, money-making, place-hunting tendencies, to see a man without any ambition as far as this life is concerned, but evidently full of ambition for another life. I enclose a letter from Delane; so you see I am in for it. I am all in large print, to offer a larger target to the arrows of the enemy.'

Max Müller, both in letters to the Times and to friends in England and abroad, upheld the independence of the Duchies: 'They are sovereign and independent states, and are indissolubly united.' He advocated the claims of the house of Augustenburg, and reprobated the high-handed policy of Bismarck, as much as the pretensions of Denmark. In later years he saw that Bismarck's policy with regard to the Duchies was the first link in the chain that led to the unity of Germany. The feeling in England was very strong. Denmark was weak, Prussia and Austria strong; therefore Denmark must be upheld—people forgetting that the Duchies, whose rights were at stake, were still weaker. Max Müller was openly attacked in the papers, and received anonymous letters from Danes in England that were too vile to show to any one; in some his life even was threatened. One old friend assumed in the Athenæum that he was the author of a pamphlet, The Dano-German Conflict and Lord Russell's Proposals of Mediation, calling it 'an ingenious mystification, the author of which wishes to be supposed to be an Englishman.' The author was an Englishman connected with the Government, and therefore could not give his name. Max Müller always signed his letters, and never masked as an Englishman.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

March 4.

'You will have gathered from the papers that I am quite well. I had lately to tell the English something of the truth, and though they don't like to hear it, yet they have taken it well. The common papers abuse me, but they are of little weight, and the leading ones behave civilly, though they answer with the most absurd nonsense. All this takes up my time, that is the worst, and disturbs my work ; but one must do one's duty, and now that I am known in England, it fell to my lot to take up the cudgels for the truth on the German side. The affair is still very complicated. Russia, Austria, and Prussia hang together, but with bad intentions. Everything now depends on France, and the Emperor will sell himself to the highest bidder—either to England or Russia. England has plunged deeply, and will hardly come out with a whole skin. Palmerston would like war, but the people, at least in manufacturing towns and the north, are against it. The King of the Belgians arrived to-day.'

TO THE SAME.

Contemporary Letter.March 4.

'M. has talked of writing to you for some days, as he was afraid you would share the fears of the German papers, which seem to think he must be in prison, or very near it, for his letters to the Times. Happily, here any one may speak out his mind freely without fear of any bad consequences. Such certainly is not the case in Berlin now, as we hear from Morier that Herr von Schlötzer has been sent off to Rome for having expressed his feelings against Bismarck too freely. The newspapers are all very angry with M., which proves that they feel the truth of what he says ; but every newspaper almost is ultra-Danish, except the local papers of Liverpool and Manchester, and other great places of trade, where the merchants are German in feeling, and entirely opposed to any idea of war. The Queen's life is no easy one at present. Her own feelings entirely German, and her Ministers and people as entirely Danish. She must be happy just now at having old King Leopold with her, as she leans so much on him.'

Max Müller's lectures this term were on 'The Origin of Fables,' and were largely attended.

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, March 30.

'I had a visit to-day from the Schleswig-Holstein architect—a very nice fellow. He came to England on business : is building a grand mansion somewhere near York. He told me many things about the war, &c. He is a man of forty-five, with wife and children, in very good business. He has enrolled himself to fight as soon as the Prussians and Austrians are gone. All his friends, he says, have done the same, and are ready to die rather than submit to the Danes again.

I had a visit from —, who brought me all sorts of messages from Princess Hohenlohe. However, I told him nothing could be done at present. I also received an address and vote of thanks from Bremen, largely signed.'

Early in April Max Müller heard of the death of his mother's old aunt, Frau Klausnitzer, mother of Emilie, Baroness Stolzenberg. He writes:—

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

April 5.

'The news of the death of the dear old aunt has affected me very much. She had indeed enjoyed the full measure of human life, and in her old age had a large measure of happiness; but when the moment of parting comes—come as it may—it comes always too soon. I have only had the printed notice, and know nothing of how it was. In your last letter you said she was so well and bright, and then I always thought, "Well, whilst the old aunt is so well and strong my mother has a good spell of life still before her." One only fancies the generations must follow each other, till the turn comes for ourselves. Well, for those who have had such a happy old age, and remained strong in mind and body to the last, those who are left can only thank God, and pray for a like end for themselves and for all they love. We accustom ourselves so easily to life as a second nature, and in spite of the graves around us, death remains something unnatural, hard and terrifying. That should not be. An early death is terrifying, but as we grow older our thoughts should accustom themselves to passing away at the end of a long life's journey. All is so beautiful, so good, so wisely ordered, that even death can be nothing hard, nothing disturbing; it all belongs to a great plan, which we do not understand, but of which we know that it is wiser than all wisdom, better than all good, that it cannot be otherwise, cannot be better. In faith we can live, and we can die—can even see those go before us, who came before us, and whom we must follow. All is not according to our will, to our wisdom, but according to a heavenly Will, and those who have once found each other through God's hand will, clinging to His hand, find each other again. Let me soon hear how you are, and submit to God's Will quietly and with resignation.'

All these early months Max Müller was preparing his second volume of Lectures on Language for the Press, which had been delayed by his visit to Germany the previous year.

Before, however, they were ready, a fourth edition of the first volume came out, of 1,250 copies like the others. He also wrote a much-admired article on 'The Language and Poetry of Schleswig-Holstein,' with some good translations of Klaus Groth's 'Platt-Deutsch Poems.' This was reprinted in Chips, first edition, Volume III.

TO REV. G. COX.

OXFORD, April 11.

'If the old generation is uncritically sceptical, the young generation is uncritically credulous. Now the young generation, the rising scholars, to a man, swear in Comparative Philology and Mythology, and the future is theirs. I am afraid as we get older we shall be equally unwilling to change our views and examine our evidence. I hope in that case we may abstain and stand by in silence; but though I hope it, I am not quite certain on that point. Surely, Comparative Mythology is not self-evident; if it were, where would be the pleasure of having dug up some of these old bones? People who make new discoveries ought not to be angry with the world for not accepting them at once! To me, I confess, though it may sound very conceited, there is a pleasure in living in a small University. I am old enough to remember the incredulous wagging of heads when Bopp declared that the infinitive was the dative or some other case of an abstract noun: there is hardly a grammar now where you do not find this. Even now, if you tell people that two only of the ten numerals in Greek and Sanskrit are oxytone, and that this is not by accident, they think you are talking nonsense. Fifty years hence a boy will be plucked who does not know it. Now you know I am myself a great unbeliever in many mythological parallelisms, and I am quite prepared to admit that many of my own comparisons will be knocked over. It is sad that it should be so, but so it is! even old Bopp's Comparative Grammar is by this time riddled with shot and crumbling down, but something better has been put in its place. But that the principles I have laid down for the study of Comparative Mythology are sound I am prepared to prove against the world.'

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, June 17.

'Our garden looks so well, and I jump out of window and look at my roses, and then go back to my work. There is to me a beauty and mystery and sanctity about flowers, and when I see them come and go, no one knows whence and whither, I ask, What more miracles do we want? What better, more beautiful, more orderly world could we wish to belong to than that by which we are surrounded and supported on all sides? Where is there a flaw or a fault? Then why should we fear unless the flaws are within us, and we will not see the blessing and the rest which we might enjoy if we only trusted to the Author of all that beauty, order, and wisdom about us? It is a perfect sin not to be happy in this world, and how much of the misery which there is, is the work of men, or could be removed by men, if they would but work together for each other's good. It seems so hopeless to do any good on so small a scale as ours must necessarily be; yet I do not think we do enough, not in proportion to what is given us without any desert.'

Max Müller had very strong feelings about the duty of almsgiving, and considered a tenth of all he had the least that should be given away annually. In most years he far exceeded this sum, and even his wife never knew the constant help he gave to poor young students and literary men, both German and English. To his mother and sister he was most generous. He had been a great smoker before his marriage, and indulged in the best cigars, but he gave up smoking entirely when he had the expenses of a household to provide for, that his charity purse, as he called it, might not suffer; and it was only in the last twenty years of his life that he took to smoking again, and then only cigarettes, and very few of them each day.

As soon as his book was printed, Max Müller joined his wife and children at Ray Lodge, and on June 22 he writes to his mother that he was expecting the publication of his second volume of Lectures, and did not trouble himself as to its reception. 'One does one's best, and one says what one feels is right, and the rest one lets alone. I am not at all sorry that I have spoken out to the English, and if they abuse me, it shows they are ashamed.' And his wife wrote also: 'Max is enjoying his holiday here, for the lectures being off his hands he is giving himself perfect rest and doing nothing but lie in the hayfields or the garden, enjoying the flowers.'

On August 1 Max Müller's third child, a third daughter, was born. In writing to ask his valued friend Dean Stanley to be godfather, he says:—

TO DEAN STANLEY.

August 2.

‘I always hoped to have you as godfather to my first son, if there should be one. As it seems, however, that there is to be no little Max, I shall wait no longer. I have no doubt that your family of godchildren is a very large one, but as I think you may trust G. and myself that we shall try to bring up our children in the real faith and true discipline of Christ, I hope you will be able to accede to our request, and add this one to many other proofs of real friendship which you have given to both of us. Have you seen Bunsen’s Leben Jesu? I read it, and wrote to Madame Bunsen asking her to have it published, and translated into English, possibly into French also. I like it, and I think just now it will do good. It contains the soul, which is wanting in Renan’s ghost, or rather in his corpse, of Christ. It gives all that is essential in the outward life of Christ, and then throws the burden of believing or disbelieving the divinity of Christ on every one of us, as it was thrown on those who witnessed His real life, who had to break with a religion dear and sacred to themselves, and whose senses and reason must have had to pass through a much more severe struggle than we have to pass through, before they yielded to the voice within, that Christ was the Son of God. I do not know whether you would consider it wise to have your name in any way connected with a translation of Bunsen’s work, but I hope it will not be brought out with any appearance of coming from a hostile camp. It should come as a message of peace—as a minimum, a very small minimum, if you like—but with a large margin on every side, which need not remain a blank.’

In writing to tell his mother of the birth of her new grandchild, Max mentions at the end of his letter that 1,000 copies of his Lectures had been sold the first day.

TO REV. G. COX.

OXFORD, August 5, 1864.

‘MY DEAR SIR,—. . . As to annihilation, all I mean is that it is a word without any conceivable meaning, and that it might do some people good to see this clearly. We are—that is enough. What we are does not depend on us; what we shall be, neither. We may conceive the idea of change in form, but not of cessation or destruction of substance. No doubt people mean frequently by annihilation the loss of conscious personality, as distinct from material annihilation. On that point I said nothing, because it would have led me too far out of my own sphere. However, what I feel about it is shortly this. If there is anything real and substantial in our conscious personality, then whatever there is real and substantial in it cannot cease to exist. If on the contrary we mean by conscious personality something that is the result of accidental circumstances, then, no doubt, we must face the idea of such a personality ceasing to be what it now is. I believe, however, that the true source and essence of our personality lies in what is the most real of all real things, and in so far as it is true, it cannot be destroyed. There is a distinction between conscious personality and personal consciousness. A child has personal consciousness; a man who is this or that, a Napoleon or a Talleyrand, has conscious personality. Much of that conscious personality is merely temporary and passes away; but the personal consciousness remains. I do not think that Schleiermacher could have said that the last enemy that would be destroyed in us is the idea of our immortality. What he may have said is, our idea of immortality. I should like to see this subject fully and freely discussed. It is no doubt the old controversy between Nominalism and Realism under a new form. We know what stuff words are made of, and it strikes me that those who know the antecedents of words are spared many troubles and difficulties in religious and philosophical struggles.'

The middle of September the whole family party went for change to Weymouth, where they were joined by Max Müller's mother, who returned with them to Oxford and stayed on with them the whole winter.

Politics crop up again towards the close of the year, as the following letter to Morier, Secretary of Legation at Berlin, shows. Morier shared all Max Müller's feelings as to the Duchies:—

OXFORD, November 10.

'MY DEAR MORIER,—For the sake of decency, if not from a feeling of personal friendship, I trust the Duchies will soon be handed over to Duke Frederick. If Prussia attempts to swallow the small morsel by itself it will stick in her throat. Hereafter it will go down together with others at one good gulp. I was so sorry not to see you again before you returned to Berlin; we went to Weymouth during September and October; my mother came to me there, and is now staying with us. We are all well, thank God, and if it were not for the dinner-parties this quiet life would be very pleasant. But I am afraid the dinner-parties will drive me sooner or later away from this country to the less hospitable shores of the Spree or Danube. Jowett's salary has again been defeated, this time in Council; it shows how low human nature can sink. It is perfectly disgusting, and I feel ashamed to accept any salary from such a body of men. The matter, however, is not to rest, and a new motion has at once been made. Is there not some great mischief brewing in all these meetings of crowned heads and Ministers? And are you quite certain that there is no mischief hatching as against England? Though John Bull does make a fool of himself now and then, the world would soon go to wrack and ruin without him. Crowned brains are just now very active, and I am sure they all consider England a bull in a china shop. There are certain fellows now very cock-a-hoop, and capable of anything in the way of spite and mischief. Yours ever affectionately.'

Christmas was spent in Oxford for the first time since 1860, and was a regular German Christmas, with a tree for the children, and German Stolle (cake) and German dishes. Max Müller, who had not spent Christmas with his mother since 1849, was as happy, and entered into everything with the same zest, as one of his own children. It was never difficult to give him pleasure, for his hard early training made of every little trifle a source of enjoyment and a cause of thankfulness to the Giver of all Good.

Early in 1865 the Max Müllers received the sad news that the family home at Ray Lodge was to be given up and the party there dispersed. The long lease had nearly run out, and the owner would only sell, not let again. Max Müller's father-in-law resolved to settle in London near his younger daughter, and the sister who had lived with him over forty years, bringing up his children, preferred the country, as did Max Müller's brother-in-law, who had hitherto, with his wife and child, lived at Ray Lodge. To the Max Müllers and Walronds it was a great loss; living, as they did, in a town, the country life was a boon to their children, and only a large country house had room for them all to meet together. It was at once resolved to spend as long a time as possible during the summer in the old home.

TO LADY AUGUSTA STANLEY.

64, HIGH STREET, OXFORD, February 7, 1865.

'DEAR LADY AUGUSTA,—Many thanks for the Theology of the Nineteenth Century—and, I hope, of many more centuries to come—which I believe I owe to your kindness. I read it with intense pleasure; it was almost like having a talk with the Dean, or listening to one of his sermons. I do not know the exact date of the Book of Daniel, and this, I am afraid, would be considered heresy by many of the Presidents and Princes; but of this I am certain, that in any century, even in our own, the lions cannot hurt a man who, like Daniel, is a servant of the living God. I hope you and the Dean are quite well. We have been living our quiet and happy life at Oxford. My mother has been with us the whole winter, and the children are well. With herzliche Grüße to the Dean, yours sincerely, 'MAX MÜLLER.'

The following letter touches on the curious legend of the Barnacle Goose, fully detailed in the second volume of Max Müller's Lectures on Language, which had excited a good deal of attention not only in England, but on the Continent:—

TO PROFESSOR BENFEY.

Translation.

64, HIGH STREET, February 26.

'DEAR COLLEAGUE,—. . . I have read the little notice on fishes and birds in Occident und Orient. As it is a later addition, it would be most remarkable if the fable had really got into the Eastern fables from the West of Europe. The occurrence of the same legend in different places allows of various explanations, but especially through the passage in Genesis i. 20, to which the priests have often referred, in order to prove that all fowl are of common origin with fishes, and therefore may be eaten on fast-days.

'These commoner legends do not therefore belong to the "myth" treated by me, which does not refer to birds in general, but only to the goose which goes by the special name of Barnacle Goose. This name can be explained, and can be connected with the name barnacle-shell.'

Early in March Max Müller went to Leeds to deliver a lecture on 'The Vedas, or the Ancient Sacred Books of the Brāhmans.'

TO HIS WIFE.

LEEDS, March 6.

'So you see I found my way after all. It was a wretched day till we got beyond Rugby, and then the sun came out, and the country looked warm and bright. It is quite spring here, and I hope the change will do me good. I found Mr. Hincks waiting for me; he is a clergyman, though I do not know of what denomination yet. He has a nice house, and a wife and two daughters. We had a quiet dinner, and in the evening the intellect of Leeds will assemble here.'

March 7.

'We had a very pleasant party last night, chiefly clergy and medical men. The Vicar of Leeds, Dr. Otley, came, though my host is the Unitarian minister of Leeds. I was a little tired, having to talk a great deal. We had a sumptuous supper, and then to bed. This morning we started after breakfast to see the town. Very fine Town-hall, with a statue of the Queen by Noble. Then we explored a wool manufactory, with some beautiful machinery, seeing the whole process from the sheep to the shawls. Then the poor parts of the town, and the Working Men's Club—all very curious, and the weather fine. We dined at three, and in the evening the lecture is to come off. Well, I must do my best. The people are all very civil, but I shall be glad when it is over. Love to mother, and give her this wool, which I saw made.'

The Philosophical Hall at Leeds was packed with a most attentive audience, which included many clergy of the Church of England, and ministers of all the leading nonconformist bodies, for the friendly relations between the Church and Dissent at Leeds, so marked in the days of Dean Hook, still continued in full force. The lecturer concluded by deducing three lessons to be learned from the careful study of the Vedas and other Sacred Books of the East. Firstly, that 'most religions were in their most ancient form, or in the minds of their authors, free from many of the blemishes that attach to them in later times. Secondly, that there was hardly any religion which did not contain some truth, sufficient to enable those who sought the Lord to find Him in their hour of need. Thirdly, that we learnt to appreciate better than ever what we really have in our own religion. No one who had not examined patiently and honestly the other religions of the world could know what Christianity really was, or could join with such truth and sincerity in the words of St. Paul, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ."' The concluding words were quoted thirty-five years later in the sermon preached in Max Müller's parish church the Sunday after his death.

Soon after his return from Leeds, Max Müller's mother, who had been with him since September, returned to Germany. With all her devotion to her son, the quiet, regular life in his house soon wearied her, accustomed as she had been from her earliest days to be actively busy in household affairs; and her deafness prevented her from sharing in the pleasures of society, especially in a foreign country. In summer, when she could be more in the open air and enjoy the beautiful College gardens, she was happier, but the long winter visits were never a success. To her son, the mere feeling that his mother was under his roof was happiness; but she required more variety and amusement than a scholar's house could give her, and it was impossible not to see that she longed for her German home, though she suffered severely when the moment of parting came.

The following letter shows that Max Müller was still occupied with the Schleswig-Holstein question. Mr. Gladstone was at this time Chancellor of the Exchequer:—

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

HIGH STREET, April 2.

‘DEAR SIR,—I hope to be in London the whole of next week, and should like very much to see you. You will easily guess the subject on which I should wish to speak to you. I have felt throughout that if there is a statesman in England who will form his opinion on the Schleswig-Holstein question, not according to what seems expedient, but according to what is just and right, it is you. There may be reasons however why you might decline to speak to me on that question, but even in that case I hope you will pardon my request.’

This spring Max Müller, who had been elected a Correspondent of the Turin Academy in 1859, was chosen as one of the six Foreign Members of that distinguished society, his colleagues being Cousin, Thiers, Böckh, Mommsen, and Grote.

Before leaving home for the summer, Max Müller found time to write to his old friend Bishop Patteson, in answer to his letter of the year before:—

64, HIGH STREET, OXFORD, April 16, 1865.

‘MY DEAR BISHOP,—I am so thoroughly ashamed of myself that I was afraid I should never have courage enough to write to you. It has been a weight on my conscience for years, and I doubt whether I shall be able to give you any intelligible reason why I put off writing to you from month to month, and from year to year, till at last I gave it up for very shame. However, the simple truth is this. I have been very busy, and I always hoped I should find time sooner or later to devote special attention to the Melanesian languages. I wished to do so first, and before I troubled you with any inquiries; and then, whenever I began to get ready for the work, I felt that I had other work to do, more necessary, and which my friends expected me to do, and that I must not attempt any new subject before having finished what I had in hand. This is the only intelligible account I can give you of my protracted silence, and now that I have done so, I can only ask that you will forgive me, though I can hardly forgive myself. My thoughts, I can truly tell you, have often been with you and your work. Many times I have envied you your choice of a life's work about which, if once chosen, there can be no doubt that it is right, useful, and pleasing in the sight of God and of men. When I first heard of your departure, I confess I was surprised. I believe I had seen you last at Dresden, revelling in ancient Italian art, and studying Hebrew or Arabic. I thought of you, as I thought of Thomson, as a future Bishop in the midst of the refined society of London, and when I received your first letter, dated somewhere latitude and longitude, I felt for a moment that you had made a mistake, and that the Church at home could ill afford to send men of your stamp as missionaries to mere savages. I do not think so now, and if I compare your lot with that of Thomson, now Archbishop of York, I feel that yours is the higher and the happier of the two.'

OXFORD, May 14.

'I had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Codrington, who told me many things about you and your work, full of interest. How different life must seem to you from what it is to us! Everything so clear before you, nothing to cause you any misgivings, work to be done which must be done, a great work without any of the littlenesses which hang about our life in English society. I cannot bring myself to take much interest in all the controversies that are going on in the Church of England, and which to a great extent centre in Oxford. No doubt the points at issue are great, and appeal to our hearts and minds, but the spirit in which they are treated seems to me so very small. How few men on either side give you the impression that they write face to face with God, and not face to face with men and the small powers that be. Surely this was not so in the early centuries, nor again at the time of the Reformation? I have great regard for Stanley, because I know him personally, and know him to be strictly honest to himself, and capable of sacrificing many things he holds most dear for the sake of truth. He takes a warm interest in your work too. I suppose you received some years ago two contributions, one from Stanley, the other from Thomson (Archbishop), which they gave me to forward to you. Stanley was most anxious to send more, but knowing how he spends his money, I would not take more than £10. I still have great faith in the Archbishop of York. Unfortunately his elevation has been very sudden, and there are many who envy him and watch him: that makes him timid, and he hardly dares to be himself. But I feel certain he is averse to persecution, and ready to make every possible allowance for difference of opinion among those who seek honestly for what is true and right. If I may judge as a mere spectator, the danger of the Church lies at present in narrow-minded clamour and partisanship. Newspapers, religious or otherwise, appealing to the masses on points which men of education and special knowledge only can understand, do more harm than any political demagogues. I wish I could send you about twenty persons, both lay and clergy, to work for ten years as missionaries with you, and I feel certain that after the removal of the leaders, the Church would have peace again. But enough of this, for I want to have some space for linguistics. The skeleton grammars you sent me are very valuable, and it is most desirable that all you can write down should be printed. Of course, if the grammatical forms could be more systematized it would be better, but at the same time there is danger in systematizing; and I consider that the most important point which, in the study of languages, can be settled by such languages as yours, and by such only, is the original want of system, the influence of the individual, the family, and the class, in the formation and tradition of speech. The natural state of language is unbounded dialectic variety, but of course in all literary languages that phase is lost to us beyond the hope of recovery. Your own missionary work, the repeating of certain prayers, &c., will artificially arrest the dialectic variety of the native language. I suppose few of your Melanesian friends recollect more than their grandfathers, and therefore it is not likely they should be conscious of changes in their language. But the great variety of local dialects are the best witnesses as to the changeableness of language, and though it would hardly be worth your while to note such things, small peculiarities in the speech of certain families or settlements might throw much light on the process, the most mysterious process, how language changes. This is the great problem on which, in the end, will depend the decision in favour of one or many beginnings of human speech. Literary languages do entirely mislead us, and have misled nearly all scholars on that point. Savage languages alone can show how far languages can change. It would be very important, too, to make observations as to the number of words sufficient for answering all the purposes of a low civilization. How many words does a Melanesian know or use? How many of them convey to him an etymological meaning, i.e. are intelligible to him in their radical intention? Does he use different names for the same thing, or does he call two things by the same name? A language of 1,000 words is more easily changed than a language of 10,000. Out of two synonymes, one is sure to be lost in time, whereas the inconvenience arising from two things being called by the same name is sure to lead to an independent coining of new words. I send you, through Mr. Codrington, a book by Mr. Tylor on Ancient Civilization, with a review of mine. It will show you how valuable accurate and trustworthy observations of the habits of savages are for many important inquiries, and it may perhaps induce you to put down in writing the results of your own observations among the ancient strata of mankind cropping out in your islands. I wish I had more time for that kind of work, but I must for the next three or four years give all my time to the finishing of my edition of the Rig-veda, the work which originally brought me to England, and which, when finished, will set me free.

‘We are hard at work canvassing for Gladstone. I believe he will be returned, and I believe his place would never be contested, if it were not for twenty or thirty idle agitators.’

Early in June the whole family moved to Ray Lodge for their last visit, and stayed there nearly three months, during which time there was a constant succession of family visitors, all wishing to see the last of the house that had been made so pleasant to all members of the large circle of relations. The Walronds were also there with their four children, and the summer months flew by all too fast to the two young wives in the home of their happy childhood and youth. The river was a constant pleasure, Max Müller becoming an expert oarsman, and many were the hours he spent with his wife on the river, under the shadow of the Taplow and Cliveden woods. One long delightful day was spent in a picnic at Medmenham Abbey, with the choir from Bray Church, in which his father-in-law, who had himself a very fine voice, had always taken a keen interest, and the old ruins echoed to many a beautiful glee and chorus. The loved Vicar of Bray drove over with his wife and daughters in the afternoon, in time to come down the river on the barge that held the large party, and, among other singers, Max Müller was persuaded to sing ‘O Tannenbaum,’ the song that nearly twenty years earlier had amused his friends in ‘Billy Russell’s’ rooms in the Temple, with its imitation of various musical instruments, and which, if report speaks true, was a delight to the ‘Monks of All Souls’ at their Gaudys for many years.

Drives, too, were taken through Hedsor, Dropmore, the Burnham Beeches, and Windsor Park, and all the other favourite haunts of bygone years. But a sense of regret underlay everything, and Max Müller in his letters of that summer to his mother constantly laments the loss to his children of the grandfather's house and gardens.

Throughout this year there was a frequent exchange of letters with Messrs. Longmans, Max Müller arranging for his friend, Professor Benfey, the publication in England of his Sanskrit Grammar, as one of the series of handbooks for Sanskrit which Max Müller was intending to publish. With the thoroughness that he carried into all his work, he made himself master of the details of printing, binding, and publishing, the cost of ink and paper, the proper charges for corrections and advertisements, and he used laughingly to say that the highest compliment he ever received was what Mr. William Longman, half in admiration and half provoked, said of him to Mr. Froude, 'As to your friend Max Müller, he can skin the flints in Paternoster Row!' A second edition of Volume II of the Lectures came out this year, and the fifth edition of Volume I.

FROM PROFESSOR HUXLEY.

MUSEUM OF GEOLOGY, JERMYN STREET,

June 15, 1865.

'MY DEAR SIR,—I beg your acceptance of the numbers of the Fortnightly Review containing my article on Ethnology, which accompanies this note.

'I lost no time on Monday in referring to Christianity and Mankind, and the perusal of your chapter on "Ethnology v. Phonology" leads me profoundly to regret that I had not been able to avail myself of the aid of so powerful an ally.

'But if you will continue to pull one way, and I the other, I have hopes we shall be able to get Ethnology and Phonology apart in time. Ever, my dear Sir, very faithfully yours, 'T. HUXLEY.'

TO PROFESSOR HUXLEY.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION, June 16, 1865.

'MY DEAR SIR,—Accept my best thanks for your article on Ethnology in the Fortnightly Review. I shall read it carefully next week, when this examination for the Indian Civil Service is over.

I have 130 candidates to examine in Sanskrit; and six hours of viva voce a day acts like an extinguisher on my reasoning faculties. I hope, however, I shall soon recover, and shall truly rejoice if, after your powerful pleading, Sir Creswell Creswell will grant a divorce to Ethnology and Phonology, two parties that ought never to have been joined together, and whose union has certainly been the cause of a succession of scientific mishaps. Believe me, yours very truly,

‘MAX MÜLLER.’

TO EDWARD TYLOR, ESQ.

RAY LODGE, June 23.

‘I am glad to hear you are going to write an article on Wilhelm von Humboldt. Steinthal has made Humboldt far more unintelligible than he is. Humboldt is much more of a poet or seer than an exact philosopher. To attempt to make him what he is not, as Steinthal has done, destroys what he really is. But I confess, to give a faithful, clear, and consistent account of Humboldt’s various and sometimes diverging views of language is by no means an easy task, and I am glad you have undertaken it. I was very sorry to have missed you when you were at Oxford. I am still deep in examination papers for the Indian Civil Service. Yours very truly.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

RAY LODGE, July 16.

‘I was lately invited to a luncheon in London to which the Queen of Holland had asked various people she wished to know—Professor Owen, Tennyson, Grote the historian, Lord Houghton, formerly Monckton Milnes and also a poet, the Editor of the Times, and my unworthy self. The Queen is very friendly, and very highly educated. She is a daughter of the old King of Wurtemberg, and we talked German together, though she speaks English and French fluently. My second volume of Lectures goes off very well, 2,200 copies sold in one year. It is stereotyped in America, and translated into French and Italian. Böttiger gets on slowly [with the German translation] and is not a good translator, but that can’t be helped now.’

It was in this summer that Mr. Gladstone stood for the last time for election as a University burgess, and was rejected. The Max Müllers were staying at Claydon House, and from there Max came in to Oxford to record his vote. On his return that evening he brought word of the mishap to the statue of King James over the gateway into the Schools quad. Originally the statue had held a sceptre in the right hand, and a Bible in the left. The tradition in Oxford had always been that the sceptre fell out of James's hand, and was smashed on the pavement, on the day that William III landed at Torbay. Certain it is that, as the voters poured out of the Theatre, the Bible was lying in pieces on the pavement, and was seen by all voters who crossed the Schools quad, coming out of the Theatre. Max Müller was of this number, on his way to his house in High Street. Of course it was considered of great significance by Mr. Gladstone's supporters. Lord Houghton was one of the party at Claydon, and read aloud of an evening Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon, which had not long appeared.

TO THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

RAY LODGE, July 19.

'MY DEAR STANLEY,—I was in town yesterday and called at the Deanery; but as I was told you had a bad headache, I did not like to send up my card. When I returned in the evening I found your letter. I shall go to Oxford to-day and be at the station at 3.55. It will be a real pleasure to show Oxford to the Queen of Holland. I liked very much what I saw of her at your house. The only people worth knowing in the world are those who, instead of being Deans or Bishops or Archbishops, &c., are themselves, or try to be, and are proud to be themselves. She hides her crown most gracefully—and crowns, I suppose, are more difficult to hide than mitres, coronets, &c.

'Gladstone is rejected by Oxford, and I grieve to see meanness, narrowness, intolerance, and conceit triumphant once more. I suppose it is right to subscribe to the Bishop of Natal's Fund; I promised to do so, though I cannot subscribe much. I do not think that he understands the language of ancient history—it is a language full of irregularities, and to try to eliminate them all is like eliminating the irregular verbs in Greek. But though I differ from him and his school, I cannot bear to see honest inquiry squashed by the clamour of Demetrius and his craftsmen, and the attempt to starve a man into silence or submission is a discovery which will be a disgrace to the nineteenth century. Ever yours,

'MAX MÜLLER.'

TO E. A. FREEMAN, ESQ.

RAY LODGE, August 12.

'MY DEAR FREEMAN,—Could you find time to send me one line if you know any book in English on the English Tell saga? I have got the Swiss books, but I want to know the history of the English tale of Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, and William of Cloudesley.

I think with you that the myth of Tell or Agamemnon makes the existence of a real Agamemnon probable, but what can the historian do with such probable heroes?'

Max Müller was singularly scrupulous as to inflicting inquiries on his friends, as he suffered himself from letters from all parts of the world, on every imaginable subject. He was most careful to answer all genuine inquiries, but when asked by one lady if football was played in England before the emigration of the Britons (whatever that meant), and by another where to get her horoscope cast, by one gentleman how to find the origin of his name Jones, by another why in learning German he might not say der but das Pferd, and by an hotel-keeper how to pronounce the word 'schedule,' and whether the term revoke or renège should be used at cards, as two gentlemen had laid heavy wagers on these points, he did not feel called on to waste his time in answers. He had a book in which these and other equally foolish letters were pasted, and in which he kept the most amusing of the envelopes addressed to him in every imaginable style.

Among the best of these envelopes are:—

'To the most celebrated and honoured Max Müller.'

'M. le Directeur, Université des Langues, Angleterre,' came straight to him.

'Professor Max Müller, Editor of the Works of the East Indies, General Post Office, London.'

'Max Müller, Ancient Professor of University, England.'

'Mr. Rev. Max Müller.'

'Master Max Müller.'

'To very honourable Knight Max Müller.'

'Sr Magnificenz Mr. Max Müller, Rector of the University.'

'The Venerable Professor Max Müller.'

'Pundit Max Müller.'

'Mr. Max, Oxford.'

'To the great Linguist Max Müller.'

'To Father Max Müller.'

'The most noblest of the noble, Great Oriental Savant, F. Max Müller.'

'To the Head authority on Language, Oxford.'

But there was one letter which he was fond of showing, though he never knew who were the writers:—

TO PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER.

March 10.

'SIR,—We are a couple of rather wild English girls, who have been trying all our lives to learn something and have not yet succeeded. We have become somewhat dissatisfied lately with our failures, and have made up our minds to master some wonderful language that few girls (or even men) would know. We intended to "go in" for Arabic, but every one says that we should never get over even the alphabet. To take only one or two you mention in your lectures, Persian and Sanskrit are as difficult as Arabic. Zend no one has ever heard of. Prakrit we cannot get the necessary materials for. What are we to do? Every one seems to think we are too fastidious, but all we want is to get hold of an unusual language that is not quite beyond our capabilities. We have at length made up our mind to try and get out of our difficulties by applying to head quarters, and trouble you with our inquiries. We enclose a directed envelope in order to take up as little of your valuable time as possible. We are, yours respectfully,

'MABEL AND ELLEN.'

The address given was 'Holly, Post Office, Kiln Green, Twyford.'

To this the following answer was sent:—

'DEAR MISS MABEL AND MISS ELLEN,—It is by no means easy to reply to your inquiry. To take up any work in good earnest is a most excellent thing, and I should be the last person to find fault with anybody for fixing on learning a language, even for the mere sake of learning something. Yet it is right that our work should have some useful object beyond the mere pleasure of working. Thus in selecting a language we might look at three ulterior objects—literature, travel, or science of language. Now, as I have no reason to suppose that you want to learn a language that might be useful to you in travelling, or that might furnish promising material for scientific analysis, I will take it for granted that literature would form an object of interest to you in the choice of a language. As it is to be a language which few people in England are likely to know, I should say take Portuguese, if you like Romance, or take Swedish, if you like Teutonic languages. The books for learning these languages are easily procured, and there is a literature both in Swedish and Portuguese very little known in this country, and well deserving the interest of two young ladies. But I am afraid you will consider both Portuguese and Swedish as far too commonplace. Well, in that case, take Siamese. You will have some difficulty in getting grammars and dictionaries, yet, if you are in earnest and apply to Messrs. Williams and Norgate, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, you will with some little trouble and expense get what you want. There is not a single man in Europe, I believe, who knows Siamese. The French, however, are opening the country, and some of their agents and missionaries have begun to study the language. The alphabet is troublesome, the grammar itself seems easy. There is a vast literature, as yet almost unknown. The King of Siam is a man of literary tastes, a man who reads and writes English, and who would no doubt be delighted to receive, say two or three years hence—for it will take at least that time—a letter written in his own language by two English ladies. With this little glimpse of romance looming in the distance I must close my letter, and beg to remain, with best wishes for perseverance and success, yours faithfully, 'M. M.'

Mabel and Ellen were the daughters of the well-known writer, Mortimer Collins, but they did not learn Swedish, Portuguese, or Siamese!

After another month at Ray Lodge the Max Müllers returned to Oxford, and the Walronds to London, and the old house knew them no more. The weather in September of this year was unusually hot, and evening after evening was spent on the river, not only on the lower river, but the Cherwell, then hardly known even to boating men, was constantly explored nearly to Islip. 'We carried the boat from one river to the other,' says a letter. It was a happy six weeks before term began, and Max Müller, who was working at his Veda, without any pressure of other work, greatly enjoyed the quiet—as he tells his mother—alone with his wife and children, and a few intimate friends who were in Oxford.

He gave two public lectures in the October Term on 'Joinville's Saint Louis,' which were much appreciated, and formed the nucleus of the article on Joinville in Chips, Volume III.

It was in October that Max Müller, finding that his friend the Bodleian Librarian, 'Bodley Coxe,' could not secure the services of any Orientalist for the place of Oriental Sub-

Librarian at the Bodleian, offered himself for the post. As soon as the Vice-Chancellor announced the day on which the 'nomination of Mr. Max Müller to the office of Sub-Librarian, which nomination has received the sanction of the Curators, will be submitted to the House,' disagreeable letters and protests began to appear. One man, signing as 'a Member of Convocation,' made out that Max Müller had an income of at least £1,100 a year from public funds (it was really £700, including his ill-paid work on the Veda). This was answered by the Bodleian Librarian, and by a Member of Convocation, in the following letters:—

November 4.

'Members of Convocation are respectfully informed that the necessities of the Bodleian Library require at this time an Under-Librarian specially conversant with Oriental Literature. Failing in his endeavour to secure the services of another distinguished Orientalist, the Librarian has been allowed (with the unanimous consent of the Curators) to submit the name of Professor Max Müller to the approval of the House, as one who, together with his Oriental learning, combines a large acquaintance with Modern European Literature, a department of scarcely less importance to the interests of the Library.

'It may be as well to correct three mis-statements which appear in the first of the letters now in circulation:—

1. Professor Müller's salary as Taylorian Professor is £500, not "more than £600."

2. He has resigned the Examinership for the Indian Civil Service.

3. His labours in editing the Vedas, so far from being "well paid," entail on him a considerable pecuniary sacrifice.

'H. O. COXE, Bodley's Librarian.'

November 6, 1865.

'The letter of a Member of Convocation contained in the Standard of October 30, furnishes us with the keynote to the threatened opposition to Professor Max Müller's appointment as Sub-Librarian to the Bodleian Library.

'As this "distinguished scholar" has been always too much occupied in the duties connected with his Professorship to mix himself up in theological or in political controversies, it is difficult to understand on what grounds he can have rendered himself obnoxious in either of these capacities, except to those who regard every German as a Rationalist, and every member of Gladstone's Committee as a Radical.

'It is to be hoped that Convocation, dismissing all such irrelevant considerations, will leave it, as on former occasions, to the Head Librarian, who has never been suspected of an undue bias towards "Liberalism in politics, or Rationalism in religion," to determine, with the sanction of the Curators, what is most needed with reference to the exigencies of an Establishment for the efficiency of which he is mainly responsible.

'MEMBER OF CONVOCATION.'

Max Müller was elected, and enjoyed the work very much ; but the strain of double work was too much, his health broke down under it, and he had to resign the Librarianship after about a year and a half. He of course ceased to be a Curator of the Bodleian (he had been elected in 1856) when he accepted the post of Sub-Librarian.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

November 1.

'Here people talk of nothing but Palmerston's death. I have never admired the man much. I was introduced to him a couple of years ago ; he looked like a dandy, but spoke in a very friendly way. He allowed himself to be more ruled by England than he ruled her. That has its good side, especially here where public opinion is well regulated, but he was entirely wanting in independence and all higher ideas of life. Stanley buried him in Westminster Abbey. I did not go up for it.'

TO DEAN STANLEY.

64, HIGH STREET, November 23.

'MY DEAR STANLEY,—Many thanks for the second series of your Lectures<sup>1</sup> just received. I shall read them as soon as I find a few quiet days, and they will recall the pleasant time when you were settled here. If you cannot have the man, the next best thing is to have his book, yet it is but a poor substitute. Why did you not put on your titlepage, "Corresponding Member of the Institute of France"? They are rather particular about that in Paris.

'The Convocation for confirming my re-election<sup>2</sup> is fixed for Friday, December 1, at two. Whether there is to be a sulphurous eruption I do not know yet, but I should not be surprised. However, you must not think of coming up. If it is to be, I have no doubt it is meant for good. I have done nothing in the matter, and my rule in life has always been not to struggle against storms that are gathering overhead, but to wait, hoping they may pass, but quite prepared for the drenching if it comes.

'I think I have been treated without that fairness and consideration which, as a rule, are generally shown by Englishmen to Englishmen; but though I may have made a mistake in settling in England, and spending here the best years of my life, I shall always be thankful for having passed through this school of life. There are many things I owe to my stay in England and to my English friends, perhaps the most precious things in a man's life—things that cannot be taken away, and that I shall value all the more, if the evening of my life is to be spent in my own country. Ever yours, 'MAX MÜLLER.'

<sup>1</sup> On the Jewish Church.

<sup>2</sup> To his Professorship.

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

HIGH STREET, November 12, 1865.

'I cannot allow another week to pass without thanking you for your essay on the Providential Position of Greece. I have read it with deep interest, and there are many things which I should like to say about it. But I live just now in the midst of a storm which will very likely drive me away from England<sup>1</sup>, and I cannot for the moment concentrate my thoughts on any other subject. I am so glad that you have said many of the things which you have said in your valedictory address. Though no human mind can ever hope to discover or to understand the vestiges of the Creator and Ruler of mankind in the broken strata of history, yet the very search for them comforts and elevates the mind of man, and the sense of our own impotence and ignorance widens and deepens our faith in the Highest Wisdom and Power.

'With many thanks for the honour you have done me in sending me your essay.'

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, November 28.

'May God watch over us, and may we never forget how much happiness He has showered upon us! There is something very awful in this life, and it is not right to try to forget it. It is well to be reminded by the trials of others of what may befall us, and what is kept from us only by the love of our Father in heaven, not by any merit of our own.'

Christmas was spent in London at the grandfather's house, but to the sorrow of the two eldest children, who recollected the regular German Christmas of the year before with their grandmother, there was no Christmas tree, the house being too small to give up a room to it.

<sup>1</sup> The opposition threatened to his election as Sub-Librarian on account of his unorthodoxy.

CHAPTER XV

1866-1867

Easter in Paris. Sanskrit Grammar. War between Prussia and Austria. Cornwall. 'My Brother.' Gold medal from Duke of Anhalt. Illness. Bournemouth. Letter on Brahma Somâj. Death of niece. 'Parks End' bought. Cure at Ems. Chips, Volumes I and II.

By January 2 the Max Müllers settled quietly again in Oxford, he remaining hard at work till Easter, when the ten days' vacation from the Bodleian was spent in a visit to Paris. The weather was too cold for expeditions, but many pleasant hours were spent with congenial friends—the Mohls, the Regniers, Barthélemy-St.-Hilaire, Stanislas Julien, Michel Bréal, and others. To Max Müller this intercourse and exchange of ideas with friends occupied in work like his own was the greatest refreshment. It was such intercourse he sorely missed in Oxford, where the men who could at all enter into his pursuits were younger than himself, and more like pupils, whilst his older friends, with whom his Oxford career had begun, had almost all moved on to other spheres of work.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, April 16.

'Our time in Paris was very amusing. The only sad thing was the recollection of so many friends whom one knew there, and who are gone. I often thought of Emilie, and of Gathy, and Hagedorn, and of my life in Paris in 1846. That is long ago, and yet I enjoy life as much as I did then, and think the grey hairs are only an outward appearance! . . . I do not believe in war, have never believed in it, but I am curious to see how long men of honour and reasonable men in Germany will submit to such a scandalous government! Now I am busy again with my work, and shall not get away till August. I have been made an Academician of Turin. There are only seven, and after Thiers and Cousin comes my unworthy self.'

TO E. B. TYLOR, ESQ.

OXFORD, April 16.

'On my return from Paris I found a copy of the Quarterly, and in it your excellent article on the Science of Language. I feel not only personally very much obliged to you, but I believe you have rendered a real service to our common studies by exciting the interest and allaying the fears of that large and important class of Englishmen who are, more or less, led by the Quarterly Review. A violent onslaught from that quarter, which was by no means unlikely, might have done serious mischief, and I therefore tender you my thanks both for what you have done, and what you have been the means of preventing. What you say about Prepositions is true. I believe, however, that those which are not predicative like trans will turn out to be prenominal, local adverbs pointing to here and there. Qui vivra verra. You have managed the Interjectionalists very well. Never did I make a greater mistake than in taking an illustration of the Bow-wow theory from Wedgwood's Dictionary, which happened to be on my table, instead of quoting the same view from a hundred other books! You have put the case very clearly, and I hope no more paper will be wasted on this unprofitable discussion. You attribute too much importance to my phonetic types or typical sounds; they were left as a mere frame, to be filled in by-and-by.'

TO THE SAME.

OXFORD, April 19.

'Many thanks for your article in the Fortnightly Review. I like it very much and agree with every word of it; only that I shall have to write a much more determined defence of the Pooh-pooh and Bow-wow theory than you have done, but of course only after defining the true meaning of these theories. I cannot get over chagrin. I do not think it can be merely leather, least of all Eastern leather; but I confess I cannot get at the history of the word. I believe that the chagreen leather is of Eastern origin, but chagrin as substantive and adjective, chagrîneux and chagriner—I confess that staggers me. The question is who first used the metaphor, if that is the origin of the word.'

Rumours of war between Austria and Prussia were now rife, and Max Müller wrote to warn his mother not to depend on seeing him and his in Germany in the summer.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

May 27.

‘We can make no plans for the summer whilst there are these rumours of war. Till now I firmly believed in peace, but now I am afraid the summer will not go by without something happening. I cannot take any interest in these matters, unless it comes to a real popular war. Till now the people have not wished for war, but only the Ministers and the soldiers, and they may eat the broth they have cooked. But how any people can submit to such a way of governing, I cannot comprehend, and am thankful I am not there. I have at last finished my Sanskrit Grammar. It came out last week, and it has taken a great load off my conscience.’

In 1864 Max Müller had arranged with Messrs. Longmans to publish a series of handbooks for the study of Sanskrit. In his preface to the first of the series, the first book of the Hitopadesa, he explains that these handbooks were intended for two classes of readers: first, for those candidates for the Indian Civil Service who desired not only to acquit themselves well in the examination, but to lay a good foundation for the subsequent study of the spoken vernaculars; and secondly, for a steadily increasing number of scholars who wished to gain an elementary but accurate knowledge of Sanskrit as a key to the study of Comparative Philology. For both these classes the existing works were too diffuse, and only adapted to those who wished to make Sanskrit their lifelong study. Max Müller’s handbooks included the first, second, third, and fourth books of the Hitopadesa, Benfey’s Sanskrit Dictionary, and a Sanskrit Grammar for beginners by Max Müller. The text of the first book of the Hitopadesa was prepared by Dr. Kielhorn, one of the many German Sanskrit scholars for whom Max Müller was instrumental in getting appointments in India.

The Librarian of the India Office, in writing to thank him for the Hitopadesa, says, ‘It is very obliging of you, in the interest of beginners, to prepare books of this description; that they are very much needed is undeniable—at last it is feasible for a student of ordinary ability to commence the study of Sanskrit without a teacher.’

Max Müller’s ‘sensible and well-constructed book’ was praised in several reviews, whilst his friend Professor Cowell had from the first welcomed the series as 'an immense help to the student. With such helps as these Sanskrit should be as easily acquired as any other language. The projected series will be invaluable.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, June 17.

'I hope that you are safe in Chemnitz, for Dresden is not the place for you. I see that the Prussians have marched into Saxony, and they are very likely to encounter the Austrians in the neighbourhood of Dresden. At Chemnitz, at all events, you are not in the immediate scene of the fighting—you have advice and help from the Krugs. Now that war has really begun things will not quiet down again so very quickly; but in the way war is now conducted, those who live at the very theatre of war will be far less disturbed than in former times. Sooner or later a war between Austria and Prussia was unavoidable, and if it is but decisive, it will lead to what all true Germans have desired for years, a united Germany. Prussia and Austria are merely names, and stand for no more than Anhalt and Reuss. The great thing is that the dualism of Prussia and Austria should be ended. Who conquers, or is conquered, is of little consequence. Germany remains Germany, and cannot be governed, even by a Roman Catholic Emperor, otherwise than she allows herself to be governed. If Prussia wins, she must cease to be Prussia; Austria the same. So wait quietly, no excitement, no partisanship. Bismarck, either with or without his own consent, may become the greatest benefactor of Germany. It is sad that your Austrian investments have fallen again! but don't make yourself miserable about it. How many people are in the same, or even worse, plight! Whatever you want, I can always give. You need have no scruples about it, for if I don't give it to you, I give it to others; and I have for years given away to others far more than I give you. What flows in so richly on me does not belong to me, and I ought to give away a great deal more than I do. So, as I say, don't vex yourself about money. Stay on quietly for the present with the Krugs. We can make no summer plans yet. France and Switzerland are the only places where it would be quiet.... Do not make the times worse than they are by over-anxiety.'

It was in this year that Max Müller made the acquaintance of Mr. John Bellows, the head of the great printing works at Bristol. At first the acquaintance was only by letter, but on meeting they were both much attracted to each other, and a true friendship sprang up which continued to the last, though, being very busy men, they did not meet as often as both desired. In sending his friend's letters to Mrs. Max Müller, Mr. Bellows says:—

‘It was in 1866 that I put before Professor Max Müller a plan I had for printing a skeleton dictionary in which travellers and missionaries might record the vocabulary of any particular language, or dialect, they wished to study. He entered heartily into it, and compiled for it a key alphabet for the various sounds that would have to be noted. It so happened that a Scottish firm just then offered me a quantity of paper they had made for Confederate bank-notes during the American War, but which they had failed to run through the blockade at Charleston. As this was very strong and thin, I used it for the Outline Dictionary. It answered well, I believe, as the edition all sold. It was really Professor Max Müller's work, however.’

The following letters show how minutely Professor Max Müller entered into the scheme:—

TO MR. JOHN BELLOWS.

64, HIGH STREET, June 20.

‘I cannot think of anything better than the inverted a to represent the á; we must not have accented letters, otherwise no doubt the Swedish â would be preferable. I do not see quite clearly the principle you follow in giving the various meanings of certain words. The book is meant for Englishmen who must be supposed to know the shades of meaning of each word; besides there is no reason to give them all. Would it not be best to give various meanings only when there is a clearly defined difference, as in Account, 1 narrative, 2 bill, 3 esteem? But why give “coming to the throne” under Accession? If the missionary wants to express that meaning he would put it under Accession, and if he wants to express “an accession to his income” he would place it there likewise, making a note for his own information. Why put casual, and by injury, under Accidental? Does accidental ever mean by injury, except indirectly?’

TO THE SAME.

OXFORD, June 27.

‘There is very little to alter. I should put v, bought, all, as a familiar English sound, before the ä of Väter. Also I should put n as optional with ñ; in fact I should not have admitted ñ at all if I had not been told that this type is generally to be found in ordinary founts. You know best whether that is so; if not, I should leave it out, and give n only. I think a little more care should be taken with the Dictionary.'

TO THE SAME.

July 18.

'I received your envelopes and the electro-typed specimens, and am much obliged to you for them. As to your Dictionary, I am afraid there is something wrong in getting the words ready for press. Why should you not take any ordinary Dictionary, and just underline in red the words which you want? I have been collating your proof-sheets with Blackley and Friedländer's Practical German Dictionary, just published by Longmans, and I really think it would take less time to underline that, than to collate the proof-sheets, to say nothing of the trouble of making the corrections in the composition. I always think that what is worth doing is worth doing well, and I feel sure that with a little more trouble at first, much trouble afterwards may be avoided.'

Since Max Müller's last letter to his mother great events had taken place in Germany. The rapid advance of the Prussians had been crowned by the great battle of Königgrätz. Austria had given up Venice to France, and the 'Seven Days' War,' as it was called in England, seemed over. The excitement and interest in England were very great.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, July 8.

'All good Germans have long desired what is now happening. The methods employed might have been better, here and there, but Prussia staked her existence to make Germany united and strong, and though I thoroughly doubt whether the motives were throughout honest and pure, yet I rejoice over the results. Prussia will have a yet harder war to wage, for war with France can hardly be avoided. But in spite of all that, Germany will at last take her right place in Europe, and that she never could have done with the "Bundestag" and thirty princes. Austria will always remain a great power in the East, but in the Protestant North an independent power must be created, be it called Prussia or Germany. I often long now to be back in Germany, though I could be of no use as a soldier. Write to me very often; I am so busy I cannot always write to you, but you have plenty of time, and all you write interests me. Also letters may get lost now, so the more you write the better. Why do not you and Emilie come to England for six or eight weeks? I do not believe that we shall have peace very soon; should it come we might still go to Germany in August and September. Do not worry too much. There is always war, and always will be, like thunder after great heat. I am very sorry for Emilie at Dessau, in the midst of Prussians with her strong Austrian feelings. Where is Adolf, and what has become of Fritz Stockmarr<sup>1</sup>?

The following letter refers to a communication from Max Müller's old schoolfellow, Karl Elze, of Dessau, a well-known Shakespearian scholar, later on Professor of English Literature at Halle. He wrote to tell his friend that a literary society in Dessau, which for some years had been giving public lectures, had resolved to apply the money so made to the founding of a Wilhelm Müller Prize, to be given each year in the three highest classes of the Dessau Gymnasium (public school) on Wilhelm Müller's birthday.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, July 16.

'I write whenever I have something to write about, and from the enclosed letter from Elze you will see that we are not quite forgotten in Dessau. I wrote at once to Elze a beautifully written letter, to tell him how pleased I was. I at once promised him 100 thalers, and hope later on to give more, so that perhaps in time it may form a Wilhelm Müller Scholarship. So you see there is a bit of good news. One hopes now the war will soon be over; well, the quicker the better. The losses are terrible, but so it has always been, and in no century has Germany been so long at peace as in this. You can well imagine I am no admirer of Bismarck, but I am convinced his policy is the only one to make Germany strong and respected by other nations. What would have become of Germany if France had attacked Hanover, or Saxony, or Hesse, and the jealousy between Prussia and Austria had made all joint action impossible? With Italy united, with the Colossus of Russia and the great mass of France, it was necessary North Germany should be united. Austria was opposed to this union and must therefore suffer, but in spite of all defeats she will always be a great power in the East, and, if she concentrates herself by giving up Italy and Germany, will, one hopes, be strong enough, in spite of Russia, to annex Turkey, and drive the Turks back to Asia. Those are my hopes, but who knows what may come? I expected that Prussia would meet with some great defeat, and that may still happen, and would do Prussia good, as thereby she would become more thoroughly German; but these things are not in our hands, and all happens as is for the best. So do not let the grey hairs appear! much worse things have happened in the world than the overthrow of a dynasty. On the whole the world is a very small grain of sand, Europe a small quarter of the world, and Austria a very small part of Europe, and the man one calls from habit Emperor is but a man, not so much better than the thousands who have fallen in Bohemia. I wish I knew how to send you some money—the letters seem to go safely enough. Stay quietly in Chemnitz. It is possible the Prussians may have to retreat, and then Dresden might have to suffer, whilst Chemnitz is off the track. Wish Krug joy for his twenty-five years' doctorate—I shall soon attain a like honour, and yet I cannot feel myself at all old!'

<sup>1</sup> Soldier cousins of Max Müller's.

TO E. B. TYLOR, ESQ.

July 6.

'Two things have escaped me which perhaps you will help me to catch. I made a note of a passage where the name Bear, for the constellation, occurred among a race that could not be suspected of Âryan influences. But I lost my reference. Secondly, I saw a paper by Mr. Edkins on the relation between Chinese, Mongolian, and Tibetan, either in the Ethnological or Anthropological Society; but this too I cannot find again. The finder shall be duly rewarded.'

As the time for his holiday drew near, Max Müller felt more and more unwilling to risk taking his wife and children to Germany in the unsettled state of things; and he was conscious, without any vanity, that he could not travel about entirely unknown, or say what he liked unheeded. He did not wish to be obliged to express any real opinion publicly for either Prussia or Austria, and it seemed wisest to keep out of Germany till things were more settled. Even in his own family party spirit ran very high. His Dessau relatives were all for Prussia, and Max Müller's own feelings were on that side, whereas his cousin Emilie, and, influenced by her, his mother, were violently Austrian.

Translation.

TO HIS MOTHER.

OXFORD, August 5.

'That nothing has come of our plans is very sad. I had gone on hoping we might get to Rügen, but the state of things is too uncertain for travelling, especially with children. It looks more peaceful at this moment, but I do not quite trust it; it is always possible that Austria may venture on another battle. Also the new organization in the north, and the Parliament in Frankfort, are sure to cause local disturbances, and as one can do nothing to help, it is better to stay away, and hope for happier times. . . . One cannot alter matters, and when you think that Babylon and Nineveh, and Athens and Rome, have passed away in the course of time, you cannot wonder so much at the Hapsburg catastrophe. Such things happen now and again, and the world goes on afterwards as before !’

Sir Benjamin Brodie and his family, and Professor Bartholomew Price with his, had gone to St. Ives in Cornwall for the summer, and persuaded the Max Müllers to follow their example. The one difficulty was a house ; the few suited to visitors were all taken. At last Lady Brodie found what was really a fisherman’s cottage close down to the beach, small and simple, but exquisitely clean, and this was promptly secured. Life at St. Ives was amusingly primitive ; the butcher came once a week from Penzance, but every house had its own poultry yard to supply deficiencies. Vegetables and fruit were even more difficult to procure : there was one baker in St. Ives. The town faces north ; the part where the visitors lived thirty-six years ago was out of the town proper, which was built on a broad spit of land surrounded, except to the south, by the sea. The town was entirely inhabited by the fishermen, and was almost unapproachable from the smell of stale fish. Behind the cottage which the Max Müllers occupied the land rose to the granite moors, from the top of which there was a wonderful view, south to Penzance and Mount’s Bay, and back north to the Bay of St. Ives and the coast towards Perranzabuloe. The smelling town was often braved, for beyond it the spit of land ended in an open meadow, from which one could see on calm days the long swell of the green waters of the Atlantic rolling in with irresistible force, or on stormy days the foaming waves as they dashed and thundered against the cliffs ; whilst the sunsets, as seen from this point, were a constant delight. Bathing was carried on from the beach in front of the Max Müllers’ cottage, ‘Primrose Villa,’ the boulders of rock fallen from the cliffs serving as dressing-rooms. At that time of year the moors were one blaze of purple heather and golden gorse—in striking contrast to the grey limestone headlands of the sea-coast. So brilliant was the colouring that, on the first walk to the moors, the eldest child, five and a half years old, who inherited all her father's passion for flowers, gave a cry of rapture as she saw the long stretch of heather and gorse, 'Oh, Daddy, whose garden is this?' Max Müller was delighted with the country, examining the cromlechs and other Celtic remains with keen interest. But his letters shall speak for themselves.

TO MR. BELLOWS.

ST. IVES, September.

'I have not been able to see much of Cornwall yet, owing to various reasons: my own health, my wife's health, and the weather. However, we are both well again; and in spite of the weather we have spent three days at the Lizard. Gew Graze, Pigeon Hugo, Kynance, and the coast as far as Cadgewith are full of interest. As soon as the weather settles a little, we mean to go to the Land's End. If possible, we shall do Carnbrea, when I hope to see your friend Mr. Michell, though I am afraid we are not up to descending into the mine. What you say about the accent in Cornish is very true. I did not know about the German miners, and I wonder whether one could find an historical account of them anywhere. The legends and stories of Cornwall are purely German—very little of Cornish left there. The names of places deserve a careful study. Mere etymology will not do it; you want first of all to ascertain their primitive form. As to "Carack luz en kuz<sup>1</sup>," please remember that I am not a Cornish scholar. I consider your argument against the modern form of kuz, instead of the Cornish cuit, Welsh coed, as quite true. So far I go with you, and this seems to me to dispose of the meaning commonly given to "Carack luz en kuz," the hoar rock in the wood. What it really meant I cannot tell; I do not see that you prove the meaning of bay for the word kúz, or of holy for lúz, unless you have some further evidence. Mere possibilities will not help much. Nor do I see that you prove that the Mount was a burial-place. If you can establish the meaning of bay for kúz it will be very important, but even to have shown that it could not have meant wood, is quite sufficient to guard against the extraordinary conclusions founded on that name. One more question, What is the earliest date for the name "Carack luz en kuz," or of the pilchard song in which it occurs?'

TO THE SAME.

ST. IVES, September 13.

'The weather is sadly against us here. We saw the Land's End, and walked along the coast to the Logan, with a fearful sea rolling at our side. It was magnificent. We went down Botollock Mine, which to my mind is as grand as anything I recollect. We have only one more week here. I wish I could stay here longer, it is a delightful neighbourhood and full of interest. Now and then one feels very near the old world. How careless people are about Celtic antiquities; while they send men-of-war to fetch home the lions and bulls of Nineveh, farmers are allowed to pull down cromlechs and caves, and use the stones for pig-styes.'

<sup>1</sup> An old name for St. Michael's Mount.

TO THE SAME.

ST. IVES, September 18.

'The fates have been sadly against me during my stay in Cornwall. First I was laid up with cold, &c., and afterwards the weather has been so uncertain that I have only just been able to see what was absolutely necessary. However, in spite of all, I am so delighted with Cornwall, that I am sure to come again, and if I could I should gladly give up Oxford and settle here, in a cottage by the sea-shore, and finish my edition and translation of the Veda, which I am afraid I shall never be able to finish at Oxford. The air here is so invigorating, and life so easy, natural, and uninterrupted by society, that one feels up to any amount of work. I tremble when I think of the hurry and flurry of Oxford, and the distraction and lassitude which it entails. . . . The growth of the modern name and legend of Marazion is very curious. . . . I wish somebody would take up the history of Cornish names of places. There are so many names of fields, and lanes, and stones, to say nothing of houses and villages, which would yield an ample harvest. . . . I should like to know the meaning of Perran, and St. Perran, and his various aliases. Can it mean "miner" or "smelter"? He seems a saint of Cornish growth, and I expect a saint who never had flesh or bone, as little as his companion, St. Chywiddan, i.e. White house, or Smelting house. Do you happen to know anything about their meaning and origin, beyond what is found in Hunt's Cornish Tales?'

So delighted was Max Müller with all he saw and heard in Cornwall—for he was never tired of the tales of Cornish saints, giants, and fairies that he learnt from various Cornish people with whom he came in contact—that he began, almost as soon as he returned to Oxford, to write the paper on 'Cornish Antiquities,' which was published the following year in the Quarterly. Another, on the question, 'Were there Jews in Cornwall?' also appeared in a periodical of the next year, and provoked long discussions; whilst a third paper, 'On the Insulation of St. Michael's Mount,' was read before the Ashmolean Society in Oxford in the autumn of 1867. All three papers were republished in the two first editions of Chips.

TO MR. JOHN BELLOWES.

September 29.

' . . . I send you what I have written down about St. Michael's Mount. I wonder whether you will be able to read it, and I want much to know what you think about it before I send it to be printed. I have taken possession of some remarks of yours, to which, however, I would gladly attach your name if you will let me do so. . . . I am in no hurry about printing it. I am pining after St. Ives, and Cornish rocks, and fresh sea-breezes.'

Just after his return to Oxford, Max Müller received intelligence that an impostor, calling himself his brother, was going about in London getting money from those whom he could take in. The story was always the same: he had been robbed on his way over from Germany, and had not enough to pay his ticket to Oxford. As the man or men continued the same fraud for several years, Max Müller at length put a notice in the Times, mentioning that he had never had a brother. This stopped the impostor in London after a time, but a few years later the same trick was tried in one of the Australian colonies, and Max received letters from several people who had been duped by him. The imposture continued on and off for quite five years, and there is still a large packet of letters from his victims marked in Max Müller's hand, 'My Brother.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

October 7.

'The Professors in Berlin are wretchedly paid, and whenever I hear of affairs there, I feel I should never be able to fit in there. I am not rich here, but independent. I think I should long ago have been in prison had I stayed in Germany; here in England I can do what I will. People abuse me, but they cannot bite, and everybody barks at his own door.'

TO PROFESSOR LEPSIUS.

Translation.

OXFORD, October 14.

' . . . The things that happen in Prussia—or shall I say Germany?—occupy one's head and one's heart. What would Bunsen have thought of it all? Many a thing has happened differently to what we should have wished, but that it has happened, and that it has advanced so far, and will advance still more and more, makes it well worth while to have lived to see it come to pass. There will have to be further struggles, but a glorious beginning has been made !'

It was in this autumn that Max Müller received a fine gold medal from his old Duke, Leopold of Dessau, who, knowing that Orders are not worn in England, except at Court, had this medal struck expressly for the student whose career he had watched with interest from his earliest childhood. On the obverse of the medal is the head of the Duke, who was a very handsome man, and on the reverse, within a broad wreath of oak and laurel leaves, the inscription :—

'Für Verdienst um Kunst und Wissenschaft dem Professor Dr. Max Müller, 1866.'

('To Professor Dr. Max Müller, 1866, for services to Art and Science.')

It was the first recognition he received, except from learned societies, and was greatly prized, and always kept on his table.

TO MR. JOHN BELLOWES.

OXFORD, November 8.

'It is very kind of you to lend me your Cornish Dictionary ; I shall take great care of it, and return it as soon as I get my own copy. It seems a very useful book, and carefully put together, only the Sanskrit comparisons are horrible. I wish Mr. Williams would publish his Celtic Grammar, but confine himself to Celtic. I guessed the riddle of the Nine Maidens as soon as I began to read your letter. I saw the stones, and I wish I had known about the missing stone, and where to find it. As to the legend, it would grow up naturally enough. If you once have the nine maidens and turned into stones, the dancing on a Sunday, &c., will come by itself. I think I could match that easily by German legends. You see that even the two pipers were soon added by popular fancy. I wish I could find out whether I am right in supposing that the two pipers, and the two stones that flank the Men-an-tol, point to the equinoctial points, and served to fix the great annual festivals. There are certainly tombs on St. Michael's Mount, and I read an ancient charter which allows people to be buried on the mainland, but still requires the dues to be paid to the Priory. I feel sure an attempt should be made to declare all real antiquities, in Cornwall and elsewhere, national property. I have collected a few cases of vandalism. If you meet with any in your readings, please let me know.'

TO THE SAME.

OXFORD, November 14.

‘ You have traced the extracts from the Sikh MSS. beautifully, and before I say more about it, let me ask you where you get that beautiful tracing-paper, and how much it is per quire. Well, there is very little known about the Sikh language. We possess several MSS. of their sacred book, the Granth, and of some minor works, all treating of the Sikh religion. The language is the Penjabi as spoken about 1500 A.D., a corruption of Sanskrit, like Hindi and the rest. The alphabet, too, is Devanâgarî, only curiously misapplied. By means of Sanskrit on the one side, and Hindi on the other, one could make out passages here and there, but that was a slow process. So I wrote through a friend of mine to some of the Sikh priests at Umritsir, asking them to write out a Sanskrit translation of some portions of their sacred code. They sent me instead a Hindi and Penjabi translation, and by means of it, and with the help of some friends who are good Hindi scholars, I made out some interesting passages. I have now written again for a literal Sanskrit translation, and when I get it I hope to publish a few specimens of the sacred writings of the Sikhs. Every book that has formed the foundation of a large religious movement ought to be accessible to scholars and theologians. It has taken me twenty years now to bring out the first edition of the sacred book of the Brâhmans, the Veda; so I am afraid life is too short to embark on a second undertaking of the same kind—the one representing the oldest, the other the most modern phase of religious thought in India—the one 1,500 years before, the other 1,500 after, our era. I should be very glad some day to see Sir Thomas Phillips’s collection; I know it is wonderfully rich. I wish some collector, like him, would rescue what there is still to be rescued of the ancient literature of India. Manuscripts in India, being made of vegetable paper, do not last much longer than 400 years. It was the duty of every rajah to keep a library and a staff of librarians, whose work it was to recopy each manuscript as soon as it began to show signs of decay. As soon as these rajahs were pensioned off, the first retrenchment they made in their establishments was the suppression of these libraries and librarians. They were not even allowed to present their libraries to the East India Company! Well, the result is that at the present moment literary works, which have been preserved for more than a thousand years, are crumbling away. In a few places, where there exists still among the natives an interest in their ancient literature, manuscripts are copied and some of them printed and lithographed. But the great bulk of Sanskrit literature (larger than the literature of Greece) is allowed to perish, whereas a few thousand pounds might preserve all that is worth preserving. If the interest which is now taken in the early history of mankind, in the origin of religions, mythological and philosophical ideas, continues for the next hundred or two hundred years, the Sanskrit MSS. would be valued hereafter, like the Codex Alexandrinus or Sinaiticus. Many of them will be unique. And strange to say the same manuscripts which in the hot and dry climate of India are so perishable are perfectly safe as soon as they are deposited in a European library. But no one takes an interest in these matters, and while people shudder at the supposed vandalism of Omar in destroying the Alexandrian Library, the same unconscious vandalism takes place unheeded under our eyes. I have not forgotten my Cornish articles; but I want to get rid, not only of the Jews, but also of the Saracens. Yours very truly.'

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, December 9.

'Life at — may be very nice for people who have nothing to do, or think they have nothing to do, and no account to give of their days and hours. But I have not learnt life so. I still have a great work to do, and I often feel that I might have done a great deal more, if I had kept the one object of my life more steadily in view. I sometimes wish you would help me more in doing that, and insist on my working harder at the Veda and nothing else. I hope I shall finish that work, and I feel convinced, though I shall not live to see it, that this edition of mine and the translation of the Veda will hereafter tell to a great extent on the fate of India, and on the growth of millions of souls in that country. It is the root of their religion, and to show them what that root is, is, I feel sure, the only way of uprooting all that has sprung from it during the last 3,000 years. If those thoughts pass through one's mind, one does grudge the hours and days and weeks that are spent in staying in people's houses, and one feels that with the many blessings showered upon one, one ought to be up and doing what may be God's work.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

LONDON, December 16.

'We stayed from Thursday to Saturday with the Belgian Minister, M. Van de Weyer, who has a beautiful place not far from Taplow. He is a very cultivated man and an experienced statesman, and was a librarian in Holland when the revolution broke out; then he became one of Leopold's Ministers. He married a rich American, and they live in great luxury. We had the same rooms Princess Alice had when she last paid them a long visit. It is very near Windsor and the Queen often drives over to see them.'

The Christmas was spent in London with the grandfather, the last the Max Müllers were to spend away from their own home till their children were grown up.

Max Müller had been far from well whilst in London, and on his return to Oxford was laid up with so severe a bronchial attack, accompanied by great prostration, that his medical attendant and friend, Mr. Symonds, was seriously anxious about him, and took him to London for further advice. He was ordered to leave Oxford at once for a milder climate. The weather was so severe that a journey to the Riviera was thought too great a risk, and just after the middle of January Max with his wife and children settled at Bournemouth, his old friend Professor Cowell undertaking his work as Sub-Librarian at the Bodleian, and occupying his house in Oxford, till it was fit for him to return home. At first he was almost entirely confined to the house, but as the weather improved and he gained strength he was able to enjoy the walks in the sheltered pine woods, which then stretched between the Bourne and Boscombe, or quiet rides with some relatives of his wife living at Bournemouth; and constant talks with one of these relatives, the banker Mr. Glyn, afterwards Lord Wolverton, was a great resource, as he was not fit for any hard mental work, and had been ordered by his doctor to leave his books in Oxford. Both Max Müller and Mr. Glyn were ardent Liberals, and great admirers of Mr. Gladstone, who, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, was in the habit year by year of talking over his Budget with Mr. Glyn, and a favourite point of discussion was whether the nation would accept Mr. Gladstone some day as Prime Minister. Mr. Glyn was in those days inclined to doubt it. One point on which the uncle and nephew disagreed entirely was in their estimation of Louis Napoleon, whom Mr. Glyn admired, as he attributed the commercial prosperity of France to his good government. Max Müller, on the other hand, who had often been in Paris, and knew how the respectable middle class kept entirely aloof of the Government, which they looked on as thoroughly evil, had no admiration for the adventurer.

It was many weeks before Max Müller at all recovered his usual health and strength; and though he began his translation of the Rig-veda, of which the prospectus had been published in January, he soon found that he was only up to lighter work, and he began to prepare his articles on Cornwall for the Press. The first, on 'Cornish Antiquities,' had been intended for the North British Review. When written he sent it to his friend Mr. Bellows, a Cornishman by birth, for revision, and in his letter mentions that he had a half-promise from a member of Parliament that he would prepare a Bill on the proper preservation of national monuments. It had been a real sorrow to him in Cornwall to see how the interesting Celtic remains were left entirely at the mercy of indifferent landowners and ignorant farmers, who had no scruples in using the fine stones for gateposts and farm buildings; in some cases, as with the ancient wells, pulling them down entirely to build them up in modern style, or as they described it, 'fitty.' Nothing more is to be found about this half-promise in any of the letters, and it was not till about 1873 that Lord Avebury, then Sir John Lubbock, introduced his Ancient Monuments Bill, which was not finally passed till 1882.

The second article, 'Are there Jews in Cornwall?' came out in Macmillan's Magazine in the April of this year. The third article, 'On the Insulation of St. Michael's Mount,' was not published till it appeared in the third volume of Chips from a German Workshop in 1870.

Before he left Oxford, Max Müller had heard from the Dean of St. Paul's, asking him to furnish a list of books that might be of interest and use to his nephew, Dr. Milman, the new Bishop of Calcutta. On furnishing the list Max Müller forwarded a letter on the Brahma Somâj, or body of pure Theists in India, written to him by Satyendra Nâth Tagore, himself a faithful adherent of the Brahma Somâj, who was the first native to pass the examination for the Indian Civil Service. As Max Müller was intimately acquainted later with Keshub Chunder Sen and Mozoomdar, leaders of the Somâj, and always took the deepest interest in the whole movement, as being, he felt, the real stepping-stone to Christianity in India, the letter is given in the Appendix. It presents the real teaching of the Somâj at that time as explained by a highly educated and enlightened follower.

TO THE DEAN OF ST. PAUL'S.

64, HIGH STREET, OXFORD,

January, 1867.

'I enclose a letter from an Indian friend of mine, Satyendra Nâth Tagore, which may possibly interest you, and which, if you like, you may forward to the Bishop. It will give him an insight into the religious aspirations of the best people in India at the present moment. The writer is the grandson of Dwarka Nâth Tagore, whom you may remember in London, some twenty years ago, a very shrewd and amiable man. His grandson came over to pass the Civil Service Examination, and, to the great dismay of the authorities, came out as No. 6. He was about twenty when I knew him in England, and he was then at the head of the so-called Brahma Somâj, which is making very considerable progress among the lower classes in India. The movement began with Râmmohun Roy, and him, too, you may have seen. His idea was to go back to the earliest form of the Indian religion, as preserved in the Vedas, and to surround the Vedas with all the defences of a revealed book. What he took for the Veda was not the original collection, but the more modern philosophical appendices, Upanishads. After his death the movement languished. I remember my young friend telling me: "Râmmohun Roy put us on a wrong track—he was a trimmer. We have entirely broken with the Veda." They have certainly put an end to idolatry, they have broken with caste, and they hold the essential points of natural religion. I need not tell you that I find it difficult to meet his arguments, and to remove his doubts with regard to some points of the Christian religion which are his stumbling-blocks. I have not written to him for some time, simply because I feel I cannot grapple with him, and he is not a man to be satisfied with words. I know some other men of a similar character in India—one, a convert, a man more like the martyrs of old than anybody I ever saw. What I feel very deeply when I have to argue with such men, is that the Christianity which conquered the world was very different from our hardened and formularized Christianity, and that the old tree will never bear transplanting into a new soil, though the young seed would probably grow up on Indian soil into as wonderful a tree as anything we have seen as yet in the history of Europe. India wants Apostles enjoying all the freedom of St. Paul; but what would the Elders at Jerusalem say to that?

‘Please return Satyendra Nâth Tagore’s letter to me when you have done with it.’

TO THE DEAN OF ST. PAUL’S (DR. MILMAN).

STAUNTON HOUSE, BOURNEMOUTH,

February 26.

‘DEAR MR. DEAN,—I see no objection whatever to Tagore’s letter being copied and shown to men who take an interest in the religious future of India, as he says himself I may make any use of it. I am particularly glad that Lord Cranborne should have seen it, if, as you say, he takes an interest in affairs of religion. I have myself the strongest belief in the growth of Christianity in India. There is no country so ripe for Christianity as India, and yet the difficulties seem enormous. The case of Nehemiah Goreh is a most interesting one; it ought to be typical, and yet it seems to be exceptional, and he became a Christian without, nay, in spite of, the missionaries. I have never yet seen a missionary or a civil servant who does not consider himself infinitely superior to any Hindu, and yet this Nehemiah Goreh has suffered more for his Christianity, and of his own free will, than any man I know in England or Germany. Such a man, and many like him, wants sympathy and love, and that is what they never find. Advice, reproof, and a good deal of de haut en bas patronizing the natives receive, no doubt, from missionaries, but respectful and loving treatment I doubt whether they ever receive. The idea that a man like Nehemiah Goreh could be in any respect his superior never enters a missionary’s mind, yet I confess I felt far more awed by that modest and honest convert than by many a bishop and archbishop. Twelve men such as Nehemiah might do more in India than hundreds of missionaries. I hope my health is getting better. I am not accustomed to be ill, and it makes me very unhappy not to be able to work. My chief complaint is want of strength. I am to stay here till May.’

The end of March brought great sorrow to Max Müller in the news of the death of his sister’s eldest daughter, nineteen years of age, after a few days’ illness. It may be remembered that she had spent part of the summer of 1863 with the Max Müllers on the Starnberger See. She had grown up into a beautiful girl and was the joy and pride of her parents. Max Müller wished to go at once to his mother and sister, but his doctor would not sanction the journey, and absence again added to his sorrow.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

BOURNEMOUTH, April 8.

‘Auguste’s letter has touched me again deeply. May God give her strength to bear this sorrow. I have spent the whole week in great anxiety and grief, and whenever I feel a little better I think I ought to have gone to you. And yet my doctor says I must still take the greatest care, and I feel myself that I only get on slowly, and the smallest change in the weather brings back the swelling and inflammation of the throat, and I might have been more of an anxiety than a help to you.’

It was during this spring that his friend Mr. Bellows brought out the Outline Dictionary mentioned earlier in this chapter, to which Max Müller contributed a valuable preface.

TO MR. BELLOWES.

OXFORD, May 3.

‘I received to-day a dozen copies of the Outline Dictionary, and was very much pleased to see the book out. I shall try to make the best use I can of these copies. I shall send one to Lepsius, Berlin Academy; Monsieur Bell, French Academy; Bishop of Melanesia, and the Bishop of New Zealand. The book strikes me as very convenient, just the right shape, and I should think missionaries would be very thankful to have such a book if they knew of it. I begin to feel so much better, now that the weather is mild, and work is again a great delight.’

Through the past winter Max Müller’s thoughts had been much occupied by the idea of a possible change in his life. The University authorities at Cambridge had founded a Chair of Sanskrit, and he was doubtful whether he ought or ought not to stand for election. Six years sooner he would have felt no doubt on the question, but he had now turned his attention more to general philology and the problems of mythology. He had lived too for nearly twenty years in Oxford, and both he and his wife were deeply attached to the place, and had many valued friends there. The following letter shows how the matter had been decided for him:—

BOURNEMOUTH, April 16, 1867.

‘MY DEAR KINGSLEY,—I am not sufficiently up in the Luxemburg question to undertake an article for Fraser, but I have written to a friend of mine, an Englishman who knows a good deal about these matters. I hope and trust the matter will be settled peaceably. Germany has enough to do at home, and though I rejoice in a united and strong Germany, I do not like to see the drill-sergeant Government strengthened more than can be helped. The absence of England from the councils of Europe is sadly felt just now. A man must dare to have friends, and dare to have enemies—and so must a people. The natural ally of England is Germany, that is to say, a united, sensibly governed, Protestant, Northern Germany. England and Germany will represent the Teutonic element in Europe, with all that is good and bad in it; and, if united by common objects, they will stand like a breakwater between the Romans and Roman Catholics in the West and South, and the Slavs and Greeks in the East and North. You want a good statesman in whom the country trusts, a man like Pitt or Sir Robert Peel. Gladstone has a foreign policy, but matters must get much worse before people in England will find out what they possess in Gladstone. He ought to retire like Camillus, and wait till greater times call for greater men.

‘Cox is a hard-working man. He wants a little sunshine—to throw off the prickles and grow into flower.

‘My Cambridge plans are at an end. I had long made up my mind not to stand against Cowell. He has now decided to become a candidate. You could not get a better man. The Master of Trinity, I hear, is favourable to him. Do what you can for him, you may do it safely. Ever yours affectionately.’

The following letter contains the first mention of the work by which perhaps Max Müller became best known to the general public, Chips from a German Workshop. On receipt of Mr. Longman’s answer he set to work at once on the collection and revision of his articles. The work came out in the autumn, when the fine preface was written. ‘It was through the preface to the Chips that I first learnt to know and love Max Müller,’ wrote one who felt he owed nearly all that was good in him to Max Müller’s teaching.

TO W. LONGMAN, ESQ.

BOURNEMOUTH, April 20, 1867.

‘DEAR SIR,—I have been looking through my essays, and I mean to revise and republish them. The first volume would contain essays on Religion, Mythology, and Traditions.

‘Afterwards there would be a second volume on Language and Literature. As a general title I thought of Chips from a German

Walter L. Codd, Ph. D.

J. Verham Gardens, Oxford.

Workshop. Would you feel inclined to take these essays on the same terms as the second volume of my Lectures? They will be ready for October, I think. Yours very truly,
'M. M.'

On one of the last days of April the Max Müllers returned to Oxford, and the same day they saw the announcement of the sale by auction, in a day or two, of the house Professor Goldwin Smith had built for himself across the Parks—which had already been laid out and planted, and were no longer the bare fields, with the Museum in their midst, of five years before. The house in High Street was damp, cold, and becoming too small, and on finding that 'Parks End,' which was only a bachelor's house, could easily be enlarged, Max Müller resolved to bid for it. It was a bright sunny day when he and his wife first went over their future home, the lilacs were in full bloom, and the little place looked its best. Not a single house then stood to the north of 'Parks End'—on the north side of what is now called Norham Gardens were cultivated fields—the nearest houses were in Park Town, and only two houses existed each side of 'Parks End.' Directly the house was bought plans were made for adding a drawing-room, and what Mr. Goldwin Smith afterwards irreverently called a 'baby-hutch,' and the work was at once begun, as his wife was resolved that Max Müller should leave High Street before the winter set in.

The lectures announced for this term were on the poem of the Nibelungen, on which he had lectured sixteen years before.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

64, HIGH STREET, May 3.

'You will hardly guess what has kept me from writing sooner. We have bought a house, and I wanted to tell you all about it. . . . You must not be anxious about me. I am really well again: our doctor thinks me much stronger in every way. I have given up the Bodleian, and shall not have so much work. The new house is really very charming, and the children are delighted with it. It is the best built house here in every way; all the chief rooms look south, and as it faces the Parks we can never have any house built in front of us. We must add to it, for it is too small, but we are able to pay the whole out of our savings without borrowing anything. We have had very happy years here, and the children are so strong and healthy; we shall be sorry to leave this house, but we are glad to have a larger and better house, and more out of the town.'

Since her daughter's great sorrow the old mother had resolved to give up her rooms in Dresden and move to Chemnitz, a change which her son had long urged her to make.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

64, HIGH STREET, May 19.

'Your rooms in Dresden must look very sad and bare, and whenever I think of poor Auguste my heart is very heavy. It is such a hopeless trial, and one sees nothing to make up for what they have lost. It is well that you have settled to move to Chemnitz, and though you will miss Dresden, few mothers have the comfort of spending their last years with their children and children's children. You can thank God for this, in spite of the many afflictions and trials He has laid on you, and then you will forget the many little disagreeables and misunderstandings which constant living together must bring. I cannot understand why you make yourself so anxious about money. I hope I shall always be able to give you as much as you want. I give away every year a fixed proportion of my income, and if it does not go to you it goes to others. The question is therefore only, whether I give it to you, or to others who perhaps need it less than you do. You should make no difficulty about such matters; there are cares enough in life without making new ones for ourselves.'

On June 9 Max Müller's youngest child and only son was born, and though he had professed to be quite satisfied with his three little girls, his letters show how he rejoiced at the birth of what is called in Germany the 'Stammhalter.'

TO HIS COUSIN, CAPTAIN VON BASEDOW.

Translation.

64, HIGH STREET, June 30, 1867.

'MY DEAR ADOLF,—You will already have heard that at last a little son has appeared here, and I wish to ask you to be one of his godfathers. Both G. and I wish the boy not to be exclusively English, and, like his name Wilhelm Grenfell, so his godfathers should be of both countries. He can then later on choose his own home, and like the old proverb ubi bene ibi patria. His other godparents are cousins of G.'s. Of course we should prefer that you should come here yourself, but if that can't be, write if you will accede to our wish, and let me have your answer as soon as possible, as the little heathen is already three weeks old. Here, thank God, all goes on well, but after all the sorrow we have had, we cannot feel very joyful. The last few years have brought many changes, but one must not lose courage. In August I think of going to Germany, and hope I shall find you all well at Dessau. Much love from us both to your wife, your mother, Tante Julie, Rosalia, Berndt and his wife, the Stockmarrs, and any old friends who still remember me. Always in true affection, 'MAX.'

Though very much stronger, it was thought wise for Max Müller to take the waters at Ems this summer, and as soon as his wife could move she and their four children went to stay with the mother-aunt near Maidenhead, and Max started for Ems, where his mother and sister and her husband joined him as his guests; and a happy month was passed together, he doing everything in his power to lighten the cloud of sorrow resting on his sister and Dr. Krug.

TO HIS WIFE.

EMS, August 19.

'We have had a beautiful walk this afternoon, and I have often wished you here; you would enjoy it so much, and I should enjoy it all so much with you. And yet what a pleasure it is to see mother so well, at least for her age, and able to enjoy all with us. And those poor Krugs—it is quite sad to see them happy, and always that fearful grief in their hearts. How often one thinks of Marie, and how she would have delighted in seeing all this beautiful scenery, and being with us. . . . Krug speaks so freely about those who are no more; I can only listen, for what can one say? Our view of death is wrong, no doubt, because our view of life is wrong: there is nothing to be feared in this beautiful world of God's own making and ordering. But parting is a wrench, even for a few weeks, and nothing can take away the pang of that long parting with those whom we have truly loved. How one grows together; how you and the children, every one of them, cling to me, and are part and parcel of myself. To lose one of them, even though one may submit to God's will, must tear a wound which can never disappear again, however time may soothe the first agony. We ought to be so grateful. I do not think of real happiness God can give more than has been given us: how can one ask for more, or wish for anything? I should like to sit quiet, to rest and be thankful, not to move, lest something should move and fall. I do long for you all, but it was right to give up something of our happiness: the more you give away the more is given you; that seems to me a law of our spiritual life. . . . All send you their best love, and wish you and the children were here; and they say it is so good of you to let me go alone. Krug thinks it will be very good for me here. The evenings are glorious. We have supper in the garden at nine—the river running by, all lighted up, and in the distance lights on the hills, and then the bright stars above. People do enjoy themselves here; there are more than 2,000 here, music everywhere, splendid roses, fine halls—I am sorry to say gambling, too.’

TO THE SAME.

EMS, August 27.

‘One look up to heaven, and all this dust of the high-road of life vanishes. Yes! one look up to heaven and even that dark shadow of death vanishes. We have made the darkness of that shadow ourselves, and our thoughts about death are very ungodly. God has willed it so; there is to be a change, and a change of such magnitude that even if angels were to come down and tell us all about it, we could not understand it, as little as the new-born child would understand what human language could tell about the present life. Think what the birth of a child, of a human soul, is; and when you have felt the utter impossibility of fathoming that mystery, then turn your thoughts upon death, and see in it a new birth, equally unfathomable, but only the continuation of that joyful mystery which we call a birth. It is all God’s work; and where is there a flaw or a fault in that wonder of all wonders, God’s ever-working work? If people talk of the miseries of life, are they not all man’s own work? Would not the carrying out of one single commandment of Christ, “Love one another,” change the whole aspect of this world, and sweep away prisons and work-houses, and envying and strife and all the strongholds of the devil? Two thousand years have nearly passed, and people have not yet understood that one single command of Christ, “Love one another.” We are as perfect heathens in that one respect as it is possible to be. No! this world might be heaven on earth, if we would but carry out God’s work and God’s commandments—and so it will be hereafter. We must submit, but we must feel that it is a great blessing to be able to submit, to be able to trust that infinite Love which embraces us on all sides, which speaks to us through every flower and every worm, which always shows us beauty and perfection, which never mars, never destroys, never wastes, never deceives, never mocks. And would that loving Father begin such a work in us, as is now going on, and then destroy it, leave it unfinished? No, what is will be; what really is in us will always be; we shall be because we are. Many things which are now will change, many things in us which we take to be our very own will change; but what we really are we shall always be; and if love forms really part of our very life, that love, changed, it may be, purified, sanctified, will be in us and remain with us through that greatest change, which we call death. The pangs of death will be the same for all that, just as the pangs of childbirth seem ordained by God, in order to moderate the exceeding joy that a child is born into the world. And as the pain is forgotten when the child is born, so it will be after death—the joy will be commensurate to the sorrow. The sorrow is but the effort necessary to raise ourselves to that new and higher state of being; and without that supreme effort or agony, the new life that waits for us is beyond our horizon, beyond our conception. It is childish to try to anticipate; we cannot know anything about it; we are meant to be ignorant; and, though we may imagine heaven and hell, even the Divina Commedia of a great poet and thinker is but child's play and nothing else. Here, as everywhere else, the purity of Christ's teaching appears. A teacher whose every word is believed is sorely tempted to promise rewards in a future life, and to paint in glowing colours the Jerusalem the Golden that is to receive those who believe in Him. Christ says, "What no eye has seen," and thus shows the truth of His vision, and the honesty in His dealing with His fellow creatures. No illusions, no anticipations, only that certainty, that quiet rest in God, that submissive expectation of the soul, which knows that all is good, all comes from God, all tends towards God. To say more is to deceive ourselves and others. But though we may thus look forward to what is to come, I quite agree with you that it is wrong to look away from this life, or to treat it as an imperfect or contemptible state. This life is as perfect as God would make it, and it is an incredible pride if we are to master and criticize this beautiful work of God. We have spoilt it first, and taken away its very sunshine and warmth—love—and then we complain that it is cold. Poverty is hard to bear, but a cheerful and contented mind does not feel the burden; and how much poverty might be alleviated, if we wished to do it! Illness is hard to bear, but it raises us above the cares of this life; it reconciles us to that parting which must come sooner or later; it makes death easy, which those who are rich and strong dread as the greatest of evils. Unkindness is hard to bear, but it leads us to examine ourselves, to weigh our own motives, to value all the more those loving hearts who return our love, and to look forward to a better time when we shall be known such as we are.'

TO THE SAME.

EMS, August 31.

'We had such a beautiful evening. We drove to a forest between Ems and the Rhine, where we could see the whole neighbourhood, and all the windings of the river about Ehrenbreitstein and Coblenz.

There was a Franciscan monastery with the fourteen stations of the Passion, arranged with such real taste and thought, and at the end a chapel and a beautiful church, all built by the present incumbent, an old man, who is his own architect, and has begged together the funds for the church, which is built in a very old and simple Byzantine style; and the walls and altar and pulpit are covered with crystals and stones and slags found in the neighbourhood, so that the interior is glittering with light. Though the experiment is difficult and apt to degenerate into mere stage effect, there is so much originality and thought about it, that one can enjoy it all, and feel with the old man who spent his life and energy in erecting that sacred place. As we drove home the first line of the new moon was visible, and Jupiter shone in all his beauty.'

TO THE SAME.

September 2.

'You have no idea how beautiful this valley is—the smooth wooded hills all around, and the river reflecting the undulating landscape, and the beautiful clear sky, and the varying tints and the brilliant stars. Life seems so light and easy here. Then it is very amusing to watch all the strange people from every part of the world—Orientals and Greeks and Wallachians, to say nothing of French, English, Americans, and Jews.

'I had a kind of semi-official application to ask me whether I would not settle in Prussia. They would give me 3,000 thalers (£450), and I need not trouble much about lecturing, either at Berlin or Bonn. I said that for the present I was tied, but that, if I settled in Germany, I should prefer to live independently without taking any office, and make what I wanted by writing. I could not quite make out from whom it came, but Professor Bernays told me the offer was serious, and he is a friend of the Minister of Public Instruction.'

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

LUSTGARTEN, EMS, September, Wednesday.

'I hope to get to Bonn on Friday night, on my return to England, and to stay till Saturday afternoon, and then start straight to London via Cologne. I trust to find you in Bonn, my best friend, for I long to have some spiritual intercourse with you before I leave. I also want to see Brandis. I shall put up at the "Stern"; Morier may be there too. What you mentioned about the German plans the other day has occupied me much, but, as I told you before, it seems to me best to remain in Oxford for a few more years. I do not deny that I should like to spend the evening of life in German air, but I stopped long ago wishing for certain things and making plans; Heaven has so far guided me so mercifully. Hoping to see you soon, ever yours.'

Directly Max Müller returned to England, the move to 'Parks End' began. The roof was already on the new part of the house, which was boarded off from the old part, in which the whole party, tightly packed, spent the winter. When once settled, his wife wrote to a relative :—

PARKS END, October 9.

'You can enter into the delight it is to Max to look round and to feel that he has bought this house with his own hard work. I am sure it is a much greater delight than any house left to one could give.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

PARKS END, October 9.

'Do not lose heart, but thank God for all that is left you; that is the chief thing, and so I wish you joy of your birthday and of your new home. May God give you many peaceful and happy hours there, and strength to bear whatever He sends. How happy our time was together in the summer, and how seldom does everything succeed so well as our stay in Ems. It is true, the sad recollections were always there as a background; but what life is without such recollections? But we must go on, and comfort comes only when we know whose hand sends the sorrow. I hope, in spite of all your fear and difficulties, that your move is safely over, and that you do not dislike your new home.'

On his own birthday this year, his forty-fourth, he writes to his mother :—

Translation.

December 6.

'Thank you for all your good wishes. I feel always as if there is hardly anything left to wish for. I can only pray God to preserve all I have! The children are all well and bright; the boy grows fast.'

To his sister he writes a few days later :—

Translation.

December 9.

'I often feel how much more happiness has been given me than I deserve; and when I think of all you have lost, I often feel how all that we call our own is only lent us for a short time, and how we cannot, from day to day, call anything ours. This Christmas time will bring you and poor Krug renewed sorrow. But try and remember how much is left you, and do not let the years you yet have together pass in mere sorrow; the years do not come again.'

The allusion in the following letter is to the intention Max Müller had already expressed of dedicating the second volume of Chips to Bernays, who was at first too modest to accept it.

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

PARKS END, December 15.

'MY DEAREST FRIEND,—I had long looked forward to giving you a public recognition of my friendship and gratitude. Though our meetings have not been frequent of late, yet they have left the memory of many beautiful and stimulating hours, and I hope indeed that a lucky star will perhaps once more bring us close to each other for a longer period. What I miss most here in Oxford is stimulating intercourse in literary and scientific circles. That is entirely wanting, especially in my special branch of study. Altogether the Englishman seems to me to have no interest for the "Becoming" or "Growing"; it is all to be tangible and ready made. All dialectic is wanting in the true sense of the word. However, there are deep shadows everywhere, and I do not want to forget the bright sides of English life, and I am afraid that I should find it somewhat difficult to get accustomed again to the rather narrow German trousers. As matters stand now, I feel bound to stay in England as long as my father-in-law is alive; what comes after we will leave to that guidance which so far has led me so beautifully. A house on the Rhine and a Professorship at Bonn would be great attractions later on. Berlin would never tempt me; it requires too many sacrifices to the Non-L——. Here in Oxford, I must say, everything is done to make up for what has been done amiss. I have been relieved from Modern Literature, and they are thinking now of founding for me a Professorship of Comparative Philology, also of raising my salary if possible, and so I hope to get again more time for my own work. I feel very well, thank God, this winter, and I hope to get on famously with my labours for the Veda.'

Max Müller found that the change to 'Parks End' gave him more rest and leisure for uninterrupted work. In High Street he had been, as it were, in the gangway, and was liable to constant interruptions. Visitors to Oxford, with half an hour to spare, would drop in unexpectedly, more especially foreigners and Americans, with or without introductions. The distance across the Parks to his house was a barrier to such unexpected invasions, and, though he had more room in his new home to welcome and entertain his friends, his daily life was quieter and more regular.

Among Max Müller's papers there was found a small memorandum, 'Our first luncheon party at "Parks End," December, 1867,' with the names of Mr. Jowett, Bob Lowe, Huxley, H. Graham, Rev. W. Rogers.

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE (who was anxious to discuss the law of copyright with Max Müller and Dean Liddell).

PARKS END, December 30.

'DEAR MR. G.,—I shall be at home to-morrow at 2 p.m., and delighted to hear any news about the Greeks and their schoolmasters, the Phoenicians. If you arrive by the 1.57 up-train, your best plan would be to take a fly at the station, and tell the driver to drive to the house that formerly belonged to Mr. Goldwin Smith. That is the house I now live in, at least one-half of it, for the new half which I have added is not yet habitable. I shall ask the Dean to come to luncheon a little after two to meet you. Dr. Scott is not in Oxford, so far as I know. Yours sincerely.'

Mr. Gladstone's signature heads the long list of distinguished guests that Max Müller had the honour of welcoming to his house during the next thirty years.

CHAPTER XVI

1868-1869

Death of sister. Visit of mother. Letter to Duke of Argyll. LL.D. at Cambridge. Professorship of Comparative Philology. Visits to Frogmore, Fulham, and Gloucester. Isle of Wight. Tennyson. Illness of children. Member of French Institute. Translations from the Vedic Hymns, Vol. I. Soden. Kiel. Denmark.

A FEW days after Mr. Gladstone's visit Max Müller wrote to him as follows:—

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, January 5.

‘ . . . I do not think that many fresh deities were introduced by the Phoenicians into Greece. The influence they exercised on the Greeks was more like that which the Greek colonists exercised on the Italians. Jupiter was not Zeus, nor Juno Hera, nor Saturnus Kronos. There was a conviction among the Greeks and the Italians that their gods must be the same, and hence any point of similarity was caught at in order to identify different deities. Something of the same kind seems to have taken place when the Phoenicians taught the Greeks their A B C. But while the names of the letters in Greek are simply Phoenician, Alpha, Beta, &c., I do not know of any names of Greek deities that demand a Phoenician etymology. It is true there is no satisfactory etymology of Poseidon, but there are hundreds, nay thousands, of words in Greek, as in English, which have no satisfactory etymology, but which no one would think of deriving from Semitic sources. . . . The subject is a very important one, and I expect will excite some interest. . . . ’

Early in February Max Müller, who had suffered so much the previous year at the loss of his niece, was called on to bear a much heavier sorrow in the death of his only sister. She was ill but a day or two, and the first intimation of any anxiety was the telegram with the news of her death. It was a terrible shock, and Max Müller was quite prostrated by the blow, which seemed all the harder to bear, as his wife had to leave him a day or two later, owing to the alarming illness of her mother-aunt and two of her sister's children.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

PARKS END, February 16.

‘Poor mother, who would have thought that you must yet bear such a loss, after all the sorrow which God has sent you in your life? And yet it was His will, and He will send the strength to bear it. He has taught us that death is not so terrible as it appears to most men—it is but a separation for a few short days, and then, too, eternity awaits us. For all the sorrow, I can only think, it is well with her; she is spared much, many a heavy burden is taken from her. She had a happy youth, and in spite of many sorrows, in all that makes the true happiness of life, hers was a happy marriage. The children to whom her heart clung are gone before her, and I think she was glad to follow. I have been reading such beautiful hymns of Paul Gerhardt’s on Death and Life—you will know them—but in the grief and sorrow God has sent us, one really feels how true, how deep, how beautiful they are. Yet life goes on, and its duties must be carried out. To-morrow I must begin my lectures; I could not do so this week. Try to trust in God, throw your grief on Him; He will help you to bear it. My only thought is how I can get you here as soon as possible. Perhaps you can find some one to travel with you, and I will meet you at Dover. My doctor still says I must not venture on the sea passage. I feel well, and cannot believe the trouble in my throat is of any consequence. Bring your maid with you, shut up your rooms, do everything you can to come soon.’

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

‘You must come to me and spend the last years of your life with me. You will find here all those who in life are the nearest to you. Dear Auguste knew, as she closed her eyes, that you would not be left alone in the world. But what will poor Krug do? It goes to my heart when I think of him and all he has suffered this last year. How different life is to what one thought it when young, how all around us falls together till we ourselves fall together. How meaningless and vain everything seems on earth, and how closely the reality of the life beyond approaches us. Many days were beautiful here, but the greater the happiness the more bitter the thought that it all passes away, that nothing remains of earthly happiness but a grateful heart and faith in God, who knows best what is best for us. May God strengthen and keep you. Even with my wife and children life seems so empty to me, and I keep saying, "My dear Auguste!" How delightful it was being together last summer. Oh, God, who could have foreseen this! Write to me as soon as you can, my poor mother. I wish I had you here.'

TO HIS WIFE.

PARKS END, February 24.

'I had a sad, very sad letter from my mother. My thoughts are always with her, and I can hardly bring myself to believe that we have really lost our dear good Auguste. She was my oldest friend and companion, and everything in my early life was connected with her. Now that she is gone, all those pleasant recollections on which one dwells, one hardly knows when, but yet which constantly pass through one's mind, are altogether changed, all life and reality taken out of them; one's own life brought more clearly before one's mind, as what it really is, a short stay in a foreign land. And there is still so much left us, so much to be happy and thankful for; and yet here, too, the thought always rushes across one's brightest hours, it cannot last—it is only for a few years—and then it must be given up. Let us work as long as it is day, let us try to do our duty, and be very thankful for God's blessings which have been showered upon us so richly; but let us learn also always to look beyond and learn to be ready to give up everything, as my poor mother has had to give up almost everything that makes life happy, and yet she can say, "Thy will be done."'

TO THE SAME.

March 31.

'It is true that I have plenty of happiness, but great happiness makes one think so often that it cannot last, and that one will have some day to give up all to which one's heart clings so. A few years sooner or later, but the time will come, and come quicker than one expects. Therefore I believe it is right to accustom oneself to the thought that we can none of us escape death, and that all our happiness here is only lent us. But at the same time we can thankfully enjoy all that God gives us, and few have more reason to say this than I.'

As soon as she felt able to travel, his mother came over to her son and stayed through the summer, but preferred returning for the winter to her own rooms in Chemnitz.

The following is one of the first letters of a correspondence with the Duke of Argyll which continued to within a short time of the Duke's death:—

TO THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

OXFORD, February 24.

‘ . . . I only wish I could send a more satisfactory answer, but, as far as I can judge, every attempt at translating the periods of natural growth or structure into the language of definite solar chronology has proved a failure. The history of language opens a vista which makes one feel almost giddy if one tries to see the end of it, but the measuring rod of the chronologist seems to me entirely out of place. Those who have eyes to see will see the immeasurable distance between the first historical appearance of language and the real beginnings of human speech: those who cannot see will oscillate between the wildly large figures of the Buddhists or the wildly small figures of the Rabbis, but they will never lay hold of what by its very nature is indefinite.

‘ The earliest historical appearance of human language takes place in Egypt. Whatever the date of the earliest hieroglyphic inscription may be, that is the earliest date of Egyptian language. I am not satisfied as yet as to the soundness of Egyptian historical chronology. The Semitic languages make their first historical appearance in the cuneiform inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar, or, it may be, of some more ancient Babylonian and Assyrian monarchs. In real literature there is nothing Semitic more ancient than the earliest portions of the Old Testament.

‘ Of Âryan language the first literary relic is the Veda. With the evidence now before us, and after a careful consideration of all objections, one may honestly say that the Hymns of the Veda could not be more modern than 1200 B.C. I believe they are older, and my belief is chiefly founded on the nature of the Vedic Sanskrit as compared with the Sanskrit of the laws of Manu, the Mahābhārata, &c. I shall just quote one instance. According to all Sanskrit grammars, that language, so rich in other forms, is without any trace of a conjunctive mood. And this is perfectly true if we take into account the ordinary Sanskrit only. But the Veda is full of conjunctives, and they are the same conjunctives as those we find in Greek. Greek has a medial form of most verbs, so has Sanskrit. Greek has a first aorist in the medium, so has Sanskrit. That first aorist in Greek is a compound form, ἐτυψάμην, and is formed by an auxiliary verb that yields σα-μην, just as I loved is formed by an auxiliary verb, viz. by did. The Sanskrit aorist is formed by the same auxiliary verb, so that ἐ/δείκ-σα-το is represented by Sanskrit a/dik-sa-ta. The conjunctive of the first aorist in Greek takes the personal terminations of the present, and loses the augment. The same in Sanskrit, at least in the Vedic Sanskrit, where corresponding to  $\delta\epsilon\acute{\iota}κ-ση-ται$  we should find dik-sa-te.

‘If we take this one form, we might call it in one sense almost a work of art, though it is only a product of that art which may be called the art of nature, and which preserves amongst an infinity of possible forms those only that are really good, really adapted for the work they have to do. These conjunctives of the medial aorist exist in Homer and in the Veda. They must have existed before Greek was Greek and Sanskrit was Sanskrit, for they are formed out of materials which exist neither in Greek nor in Sanskrit. In the same manner mais and mai must have been formed before Italian was Italian or French French, for neither of these dialects have the materials out of which mai or mais could have been formed. But how little should we gain if we argued as some geologists do! It has taken so many centuries before the Latin magis dwindled down to mai and mais, therefore it cannot have taken less time to change the original type of  $\delta\epsilon\acute{\iota}κ-ση-ται$  and dik-sa-te into these two forms. It is far better to look at these forms and find out how much even their typical ancestor presupposed, how much wear and tear was necessary before such a compound could become possible as we see fixed in that grammatical system which preceded Sanskrit and Greek. In that compound we have at least four elements. We have the augment, and no language, not even the most ancient, has as yet betrayed the secret as to the material out of which the augment was formed. Secondly, we have the personal termination ται or te, clearly a pronoun of the third person, but different from the pronouns of the third person such as we find them in Sanskrit or Greek. Thirdly, an auxiliary verb σα, the Sanskrit as, to be, in as-mi, ἐσ-μὶ, &c., which loses its initial vowel as it does in Latin sum for es-um. This as meant originally to breathe (in Sanskrit as-u, ‘breath’), and before it dwindled down to what we call an auxiliary verb, a mere verbal copula, again how many centuries must have passed? Can we measure them by the distance that divides the Latin status from stato and éte? I doubt it, yet we can see deeper and deeper into the shaft from which the ore of human speech is brought, and discover level after level that must have been left behind before the pure metal, and before such amalgamates could have been produced as those which we see in such a conjunctive as dik-sa-te. After that amalgamate is formed, and after it has been coined into a definite grammatical token, begins the phonetic decay, the influence, it may be, of diet, climate, and all the rest; and only after all this can we account for the fact that in the Homeric poems we find a form like  $\delta\epsilon\acute{\iota}κ-ση-ται$ , and in the Hymns of the Veda a form like dik-sa-te.

‘In all these considerations the question how a root dik came to mean “to show” and nothing else has not been touched upon, though that again can only have been the result of a sifting process of which we can hardly form an adequate idea. If there was proof that it had taken 10,000 years to form out of given radical elements that wonderful system of grammar which was quite finished before Sanskrit became Sanskrit and Greek Greek, I should feel no surprise. Before that date we should still have the formation of roots. What we commonly call the history of language is from the very beginning nothing but a history of decay—the period of youth and growth is past before we know of any language.’

In the month of January, Max Müller had received an invitation from Cambridge to deliver the Rede Lecture in the course of the summer. The Vice-Chancellor, in transmitting the invitation, observed that these lectures were generally scientific rather than literary, but that Mr. Ruskin had been the lecturer of the previous year, adding, ‘Your subject, however, is a science, whatever the Royal or any other Institution may say to the contrary.’ Max Müller accepted the invitation, and in writing again in April to fix the day, the Vice-Chancellor told him that the University wished to offer him the degree of LL.D. Accordingly, the last week in May, Max Müller and his wife visited Cambridge, where they were the guests of Dr. Thompson, Master of Trinity. Commodore Maury, the American hydrographer, and Dr. W. Wright, the Arabic scholar, received the degree of LL.D. the same day. The Public Orator, Dr. G. W. Clark, thus presented Max Müller :—

‘Sequitur deinde Max Müller, Taylorianus apud Oxonienses Professor, qui, cum iuvenis admodum, consiliis et auspicio celeberrimi viri Christiani de Bunsen, se in Britanniam transtulisset, hanc sibi sedem et novam patriam elegit, atque ita profecit ut si loquentem audiveris, non dubites in Anglia natum, si magnitudinem operum respexeris, Germanum esse cognoscas.

‘Ad id vero potissimum navavit operam, ut Philologiam doceret, non eam quae circa verborum argutias commoretur, sed illam quae, linguis Teutonicis, Graeca, Latina, Sanscritica, inter se collatis, communem omnium originem exquirat, incunabula gentium recludat, historiam quibusvis annalibus antiquiorem certioreque evolvat.

‘Quid multa? cras, ipso audito, quanta facundia difficillimas res expedire possit, omnes iudicaturi estis.’

Translation.

‘I would next speak of Max Müller, the Taylorian Professor in Oxford, who having while still a youth, with the advice and under the auspices of that illustrious man Christian von Bunsen, come over to Britain, has chosen this land for a new home and country, and has made such progress that, having heard him speak, you think he must have been born in England, whereas, if you consider the importance and quantity of his works, you are quite sure that he must be a German. The work he has devoted himself to especially has been the work of teaching Philology, not that branch of it which is concerned with the niceties and subtleties of words, but that which, by the comparison of the Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, and German languages, investigates their common origin, discovers the cradle of the nations, and unfolds a history more ancient and more certain than that contained in any written annals. What need of further words! To-morrow, when you have heard him speak, you will all be able to judge with what eloquence he can make the most difficult subjects clear and plain.’

The next day Max Müller delivered the Rede Lecture to a very large audience. It will be found in Vol. IV of Chips, first edition. In the middle of the lecture, Commodore Maury, who sat behind the lecturer’s wife, leant over and said in a loud whisper, ‘I must tell you, it’s just elegant!’

During the winter months a movement had been going on in Oxford for the foundation of a Chair of Comparative Philology, which was carried out in the May Term, with the proviso in the statute of foundation that Max Müller was to be the first Professor, if he would accept the post. He was deeply gratified by this mark of esteem from the resident members of the University, and it relieved him of the duties of the Chair of Modern Languages, added to his salary, and enabled him to devote all his time and energies to his own line of studies. His inaugural lecture was delivered in the October Term. ‘Professor Max Müller,’ says a contemporary notice, ‘enjoys the high honour—an honour the more signal as he is a foreigner—of occupying the first Professorship ever founded at Oxford by the University Corporation itself; all previous Professorships having been established either by royal benefactions or private announcements.’

Early in June Max Müller paid his first visit to their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Christian, then living at Frogmore. These visits were always a rest and refreshment to him, a delightful contrast to his quiet life of hard work, and the gracious friendly feeling always shown to him and his called forth his lively gratitude to the last.

TO HIS WIFE.

FROGMORE HOUSE, June 1.

‘I came here in good time last night, though after a long and hot journey. When I arrived at Frogmore the Prince and Princess were just coming back from a walk, and they asked me at once to take a walk with them in the garden, which just now is in great beauty. We passed the Mausoleum, and when we came back sat down and had a long and animated discussion, all in German, though the Prince speaks English very well. We then went in to get ready for dinner, and dined at half-past eight: no one present but the Prince, the Princess, Lady Susan Melville, and myself. One of the servants was in Scotch attire, but no bagpipes<sup>1</sup>. Nothing could be pleasanter. The Princess kindly inquired after you and the children, and is of course wrapped up in her own boy<sup>2</sup>, whom I have not yet seen. After dinner, Lady Susan left, and we went up a small staircase to the smoking-room, the Princess sitting down in an armchair and the Prince asking me to smoke. This, however, I could not bring myself to do till the Princess had left. I sat up till nearly twelve with the Prince. He is a true Schleswig-Holsteiner, very quiet but very determined, and very frank. He has fine blue eyes, and is a decidedly handsome man. His photographs do not do him justice.’

TO HIS CHILDREN.

FROGMORE, June 2.

‘MY DEAR LITTLE GIRLS,—I have just come back from a beautiful drive through Windsor Forest. We drove in an open carriage—Prince and Princess Christian, Lady Susan Melville, and your daddy. There was a long avenue of rhododendrons all in flower, and we drove through it, and you never saw so many beautiful flowers together. And then the Prince took me to see the house where all the dogs live that belong to the Queen. It was like the Zoological Gardens, but all the animals were different kinds of dogs—greyhounds and deerhounds, like old Oscar, and Teckels, like those mama had at

<sup>1</sup> Bagpipes were a horror to Max Müller.

<sup>2</sup> Prince Christian Victor, who died the day after Max Müller.

Ray Lodge ; and some very scarce but valuable dogs, called "mops" in German : there are only three of them left in England, and the Queen takes great care of them. Prince Christian is a German prince, and he married Princess Helena, a daughter of the Queen ; and they are very happy together, just like mama and papa, only they are very rich and have a beautiful house and garden ; and they have one little boy, a little older than our boykin, and he is a very handsome little fellow, with large blue eyes and rosy cheeks.'

TO PROFESSOR LEPSIUS.

Translation.

PARKS END, June 18.

'MY HONOURED FRIEND,—. . . Bunsen's Life has gone straight to my heart, as it has with you. Oh, if we could even in this life forget all that is unessential, all that makes it so hard for us to recognize true greatness and goodness in the character of those with whom this life brings us into contact for a little while ! How much we lose by making little things so important, and how rarely do we think highly enough of what is essential and lasting ! Bunsen surely was one of the greatest spirits of our times ! Where are the greater ones ? To have known him, belongs to those things which have bestowed upon my life the greatest value and the greatest charm. I should much like to hear from you where something reliable and trustworthy may be found with regard to Egyptian mythology. Is Bunsen's opinion about a Phœnician origin well founded ? Are not there any real Egyptian gods ? And can their origin and their development be traced ? . . . Some time ago I wrote for the Times a notice of Bunsen's Life, but until Parliament rises there is not much hope of its appearing ; it has been clipped a good deal, and I think a little later on I shall publish it unmutilated.'

TO M. RENAN.

PARKS END, June 26.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,—I can truly feel for you in the loss which you have suffered ; it will sooner or later come to all of us. But life is different after we have lost our father and mother. I have my mother staying with me, and should enjoy her presence here very much if it were not for the sad cause which brought her here—the death of my only sister, with whom she used to live in Germany. With every one of these losses life seems to become more unreal, there is less and less to live for, to care for ; and if one still cares for one's work, it is because it makes one forget life as it is, and life as we thought it was or might be. . . . I hear your new work is nearly finished and I am curious to see what you think of St. Paul. I hope you have seen Jowett's book on the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans; it is very good, original, and honest. I am able at last to work again, and I hope my health is quite re-established. I am printing my first translation of the Rig-veda; I sent you a specimen the other day, and hope to send you the first volume by September. I am also reprinting my Chips, which have just been preached against in Westminster Abbey.'

TO THE SAME.

PARKS END, 1868.

'You speak in far too laudatory terms of my own work, and I am afraid it will only raise the bile of certain people. I was amused by what you said about the Concessions aux Nègres. You are right to a certain extent, but the same applies to all countries. If you want to carry people along with you, you must begin where you find them, otherwise you run on like an engine without any carriages attached to it. The best proof that I do not concede too much is that the science of religion has been preached against in Westminster Abbey by a real bishop. However, they do not mean to burn me yet, and I hope I shall still convince the Bishop that we heretical Germans are far better Christians than the most orthodox of bishops. I am printing my translation of the Veda. I had called it in my preface a Traduction raisonnée, if one may use such an expression, and I am glad to find you use that very word in your Rapports. I have also finished my edition of the Prâtisākhya, in which I was forestalled by Regnier. His edition is really excellent, and I cannot sufficiently regret that he should have been taken away from Sanskrit. The school of Burnouf will become extinct with him. After carefully examining every line of his Prâtisākhya while printing my own, I am bound to say there is not another Sanskrit scholar living who would have done his work as well as Regnier. It is bad enough that the throne should be usurped, but why Chairs of Sanskrit or Hebrew? However, I am afraid I am talking treason, and with Ewald's<sup>1</sup> example before me I ought to be careful.'

Another pleasant visit paid this year was to the Bishop of London and Mrs. Tait, at Fulham, on one afternoon of which Max Müller and his wife were taken to the Volunteer Camp at Wimbledon, and watched the shooting for the Queen's Prize. Since the Ray Lodge days he had ceased himself to be an active Volunteer.

<sup>1</sup> He had refused in 1867 to take the oath of allegiance to Prussia and was pensioned off.

Soon after this Max Müller made a short visit to Gloucester and its neighbourhood, guided by his friend Mr. Bellows. Of this visit Mr. Bellows writes:—

‘When at your house in 1868 I found Professor Max Müller had some thought of visiting the Phillips Library at Cheltenham to examine the Oriental MSS. it contained, and I asked him to come to Gloucester for a few days, when he could do this, besides joining one of our field excursions of the Cotteswold Club to Berkeley Castle, &c.: a little programme that was soon after carried out. I recollect that to impress him the more favourably with our Gloucestershire scenery I told him of an old friend of ours, James Atkins, a well-known botanist, having come to Painswick several years before to spend a fortnight, and that he was so pleased with the Cotswold Hills that he had stayed there ever since.

‘Professor Max Müller smiled, and rejoined, “Do you know that that was what happened to me, here at Oxford! I came here to spend a fortnight, and I have been here ever since!”

‘I first ventured to write to Professor Max Müller on some philological matter—I am not sure what, but I think something about the old Cornish language, about which I wanted to beg his help. When I came to know him personally I was irresistibly attracted by the power of sympathy that was his most striking characteristic, as I am sure others will admit that it was, and the secret of the charm that made him a leader of men. This power of sympathy he possessed in a larger degree than any other person I have ever met, except Count Tolstoi: for greatly as they differed in their other gifts, as well as in their entire environments, Max Müller and Tolstoi were alike in this.

‘Even the high attainments Professor Max Müller unquestionably possessed did not so affect those with whom he came in contact as did this force of sympathy, to which he owed his broad-mindedness, and his insight into the essence of religion itself: I will not say of the religions of the East merely, but the general relation of the soul of man to the truth, in which all these are included. I need only refer to his preface to Chips from a German Workshop as a noble example of his sympathy for men of widely differing modes of thought. It reads like an expansion of the nineteenth psalm, where the universality of the sunlight and sunheat in the outward creation is shown as the correlative to the uncreated light and power that is unlimited in its operation, by time or space. And now he is gone, and no one will ever again take his place. This very thought is assurance, for it means that he fills a place in another state of existence for which he alone was created.’

One of the visits paid under Mr. Bellows' guidance was to Mr. Bryan Hodgson, who, as Resident at Nepal, had acquired an extensive acquaintance with the tribes and languages of the Himalayan slopes. Mr. Hodgson lived to a great age, and died in 1895. It is from his researches that our knowledge of Northern Buddhism is chiefly derived. He formed a valuable collection of above 300 MSS., a few of which he gave to the Bodleian.

TO MR. BRYAN HODGSON.

PARKS END, August 25, 1868.

'MY DEAR HODGSON,—What would I give for your quiet Vihár at Alderley—your otium cum dignitate—doing exactly as you like, reading or writing what you like, without being driven to publish and republish, without lectures, without printer's devils, &c. &c. I can assure you I am sometimes nearly beside myself with all I have to attend to; to say nothing of mere Grihastha matters, which are sometimes troublesome too. However, it cannot be helped, and I only mention it as my excuse for not having written to you before. I have looked at your papers and the drawing, and I think it would be a great pity if those carefully executed sketches were not published. Then as to my lecture ("Stratification of Language") I cannot think that we differ so much. I have frequently availed myself of lexicographic evidence. But grammatical evidences have, as you know, a different value, and for the object I had in view in my lecture the grammatical structure of language was of the greatest importance.'

In the autumn a new edition of both volumes of the Lectures on Language was called for. It was the fifth edition of Vol. I, the second of Vol. II. The new edition of two volumes was of 3,000 copies. At the same time a large second edition of Chips, Vols. I and II, was published, and Max Müller found that his writings in this one year had brought in above £1,200.

Except the short visits mentioned, the summer had been spent in work at Oxford, and as soon as his mother returned to Germany, he took his wife and children to Bonchurch, and gave himself up to rest and outdoor life for a fortnight. Long walks were taken with his wife in all directions, and all parts of the beautiful island were explored. One delightful day was given to Carisbrooke, where the rector, Mr. James, an early Oxford friend, received the Max Müllers, showing them the Castle and the fine Roman villa, which had not been long excavated.

Another expedition, in which their eldest child shared, was to Freshwater, where a night was spent with Mr. and Mrs. Tennyson. The poet was in rather a silent mood till after the ladies withdrew, when, over their pipes, he read out some of his latest poems to Max Müller, his rich deep voice sounding through the house till far into the small hours.

TO HIS MOTHER (for her birthday).

Translation.

BONCHURCH, October 9.

'Each birthday, even the happiest, has its sad side. It is a station nearer death; but whilst in youth and the full enjoyment of life this thought seems terrible, it loses much of its terror as one gets older, for the parting from the few whom we leave behind is made up for by the hope of rejoining the many who are gone before us. So, though this birthday must be very sad to you, you must accustom yourself more and more to the thought that here is not our abiding city, that all that we call ours here is only lent, not given us, and that if the sorrow for those we have lost remains the same, we must yet acknowledge with gratitude to God the great blessing of having enjoyed so many years with those whom He gave us as parents, or children, or friends. One forgets so easily the happy years we have had with those who were the nearest to us. Even these years of happiness, however short they may have been, were only given us, we had not deserved them. I know well there is no comfort for this pain of parting; the wound always remains, but one learns to bear the pain, and learns to thank God for what He gave, for the beautiful memories of the past, and the yet more beautiful hope for the future. If a man has lent us anything for several years, and at last takes it back, he expects gratitude, not anger, and if God has more patience with our weakness than men have, yet murmurs and complaints for the life which He measured out to us as is best for us, are not what He expected from us. A spirit of resignation to God's will is the only comfort, the only relief under the trials God lays upon us, and with such a spirit the heaviest as well as the lightest trials of life are not only bearable, but useful, and gratitude to God and peace in life and in death remain untroubled. May this quiet and peaceful resignation beautify and brighten the evening of your life, that is the one wish I have for your sixty-eighth birthday. . . . We were yesterday at Freshwater, where Tennyson has his house, and he invited us (G. and Ada) to stay with him. It was very interesting.'

The following letter was written to the Duke of Argyll soon after his appointment as Secretary of State for India :—

TO THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

OXFORD, December 16.

‘ . . . As for more than twenty years my principal work has been devoted to the ancient literature of India, I cannot but feel a deep and real sympathy for all that concerns the higher interests of the people of that country. Though I have never been in India, I have many friends there, both among the civilians and among the natives, and I believe I am not mistaken in supposing that the publication in England of the ancient sacred writings of the Brâhmans, which had never been published in India, and other contributions from different European scholars towards a better knowledge of the ancient literature and religion of India, have not been without some effect on the intellectual and religious movement that is going on among the more thoughtful members of Indian society. I have sometimes regretted that I am not an Englishman, and able to help more actively in the great work of educating and improving the natives. But I do rejoice that this great task of governing and benefiting India should have fallen to one who knows the greatness of that task and all its opportunities and responsibilities, who thinks not only of its political and financial bearings, but has a heart to feel for the moral welfare of those millions of human beings that are, more or less directly, committed to his charge.

‘ India has been conquered once, but India must be conquered again, and that second conquest should be a conquest by education. Much has been done for education of late, but if the funds were tripled and quadrupled, that would hardly be enough.

‘ The results of the educational work carried on during the last twenty years are palpable everywhere. They are good and bad, as was to be expected. It is easy to find fault with what is called Young Bengal, the product of English ideas grafted on the native mind. But Young Bengal, with all its faults, is full of promise. Its bad features are apparent everywhere, its good qualities are naturally hidden from the eyes of careless observers. . . . India can never be anglicized, but it can be reinvigorated. By encouraging a study of their own ancient literature, as part of their education, a national feeling of pride and self-respect will be reawakened among those who influence the large masses of the people. A new national literature may spring up, impregnated with Western ideas, yet retaining its native spirit and character. The two things hang together. In order to raise the character of the vernaculars, a study of the ancient classical language is absolutely necessary: for from it these modern dialects have branched off, and from it alone can they draw their vital strength and beauty. A new national literature will bring with it a new national life and new moral vigour. As to religion, that will take care of itself. The missionaries have done far more than they themselves seem to be aware of, nay, much of the work which is theirs they would probably disclaim. The Christianity of our nineteenth century will hardly be the Christianity of India. But the ancient religion of India is doomed—and if Christianity does not step in, whose fault will it be?’

The following letter alludes to a little indulgence Max Müller allowed himself more than once. The forests round Dessau are famous for their wild boar, and through his cousin, Baroness Stolzenberg, he was able occasionally to secure one from the ducal forester. The arrival of the first one entire made a sensation at the Oxford Railway Station, and a message was sent up that a dead ‘Bear’ had arrived there for Professor Max Müller. The dinner given to eat the haunch was a great success, and one head of a house was observed to enjoy three helpings.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

PARKS END, December 20.

‘Yesterday we had a large dinner-party, the Vice-Chancellor, &c., and had the haunch of wild boar, which was excellent. We had already lived a week on the boar, which was a very good one, and arrived in good condition. A young man in London who comes here sometimes to work for me brought it in its skin. The skin is being dressed as a mat, the head we have sent to my father-in-law, and the rest we are slowly eating up. It has amused me having it, and brought back old days.’

The first months of 1869 brought great anxiety to Max Müller and his wife. Early in January they went with their two eldest girls to stay with a cousin at Taplow, where, after a few days, their eldest child sickened with scarlet fever. The alarm was very great, as there was a large party of young cousins living in the house, and the whole family moved at once, the mother and her sick child alone remaining isolated on the top floor of a huge country house. Max Müller, who had already returned to Oxford, had the younger children with him, and could not therefore go to his wife and sick child for fear of infection. It was a very severe case, and the eldest child was only slowly recovering when the second little girl developed the terrible illness, and was brought back to be nursed with her sister. Max Müller suffered acutely from the anxiety, which lasted nearly two months, greatly aggravated too by the feeling that they had driven the whole family from their home. Mercifully the infection did not spread. The second child lay for more than a fortnight at death's door. One night, when her case seemed hopeless, the father came to see her, but the lengthy process of disinfection made it impossible for him to repeat the visit, as his lectures had begun. His daily letters were the one support of his wife.

'How little one thinks that these heavy trials and afflictions may come upon us any day. One lives on as if life were to last for ever, and as if we should never part with those who are most dear to us. Life would be intolerable were it otherwise, but how little one is prepared for what life really is.'

January 24.

'I am longing to see you and our dear little Ada. I am afraid you do not tell me all, and I cannot tell you how I feel for your solitude in all this fearful anxiety. There is but one help and one comfort in these trials, that is to know by whom they are sent. If one knows that nothing can happen to us without Him, one does not feel quite helpless even under the greatest terrors of this life. I tremble always when I open your letters.'

One ray of sunshine came to brighten this time of gloom, in Max Müller's election as a Foreign Member of the French Institute, the youngest man ever elected. The choice lay between him and Theodor Mommsen, who was some years his senior. In writing to congratulate him, Max Müller's child-like friend, Stanislas Julien, the great Sinologue, says: 'et maintenant vous pouvez porter l'habit brodé'—the beautiful dress invented for the members of the Institute by Richelieu, and which Max Müller, before he was made a Privy Councillor, always wore at Court by the Queen's permission.

TO MAX MÜLLER.

PARIS, 1<sup>er</sup> mars.

'J'ai été heureux, Monsieur, de concourir à votre nomination comme associé étranger de l'Institut. Précisément l'été dernier j'avais lu vos Lectures à la British Institution sur la science et la formation du langage, et j'avais été extrêmement frappé de l'élévation, de la profondeur et de l'abondance des idées que vous y avez exposées. Je ne suis pas un juge compétent de vos travaux sur les Védas, mais je me félicite d'avoir un peu contribué à vous en fournir les matériaux, et je vous remercie d'en avoir gardé le souvenir. Mon seul regret est de ne vous avoir pas acquis vous-même à la France. C'est une fortune que j'envie un peu à l'Angleterre, tout en lui en faisant mon compliment. Recevez, Monsieur et savant confrère, l'assurance de ma considération la plus distinguée.

'GUIZOT.'

Translation.

'I was glad, Monsieur, to contribute to your nomination as a Foreign Member of the Institute. It was only last year that I read your Lectures at the British Institution on the "Science and Formation of Language," and I was very much struck with the elevation, the depth, and the richness of the ideas which you there brought forward. I am not a competent judge of your labours on the Rig-veda, but I congratulate myself in having contributed a little in furnishing you with materials for it, and I thank you for remembering this. My one regret is, not to have secured you yourself for France. It is a piece of good fortune for which I envy, though at the same time I congratulate, England. Receive, Monsieur and learned confrère, the assurance of my highest esteem.

'GUIZOT.'

TO HIS WIFE.

February 14.

'One does not like to think of anything, or feel happy about anything, till this illness of the children is quite over; yet you will see from the enclosed letters that I have felt very happy to-day when I heard that I had been elected one of the eight Foreign Members of the Academy. It has been my ambition, I might almost say my foolish ambition through life, to be some day what I saw Humboldt was, when as a mere boy I first called on him in Paris, a Foreign Member of the French Institute; and now the thing has come to pass, and I do feel very happy about it. Still, what is that till we know that our little Mary is out of danger, and that we may look forward to a happy meeting?'

March 15.

'I assure you when I think of what might have been, I seem to have no room for any feeling but that of unceasing thankfulness. "Forget not all His benefits." One ought to keep up the recollection of these great blessings, for daily life is so very apt to wash it away.'

Early in January Max Müller received a pressing invitation from Professor Huxley, who had just been made President of the Ethnological Society, to lecture on the ethnological aspects of Indian Philology.

TO PROFESSOR HUXLEY.

PARKS END, January 8, 1869.

‘It is very difficult to say no to such pleading as yours. But I have made a vow to undertake nothing new till what I have now in hand is finished, and it would be dishonest not to keep it. I am truly glad that you have taken the Ethnological Society in hand. I have not followed all the squabbles there seem to have been, but I feel certain that something ought to be done to raise the character of ethnological or anthropological research, and there is no one who can do it as well as you. I shall willingly help you hereafter when I am a little freer, but there are three books in the Press that must be finished first—(1) the first volume of the translation of the Rig-veda, (2) the Prātisākhya, the oldest work on phonetics (this is printed), and (3) the fifth volume of the text of the Rig-veda, with the native commentaries. I hope this will all be done before the year is out, but even then I have promised Longman two more volumes of Chips.

‘I should be so glad if you would come to Oxford from a Saturday to Monday and stay with us. Term begins towards the end of January; if you could let me know a week before, I could then make sure of some friends who would be glad to meet you.’

Among the many young Germans whom Max Müller was able to assist to positions in India few became more distinguished, or have done better work for Sanskrit scholarship, than Dr. Kielhorn, now Professor at Göttingen. The following is one of the many letters that passed between them:—

TO DR. KIELHORN.

Translation.

PARKS END, January 10.

‘... I am delighted with your photograph, you look so well, and the old Pundit at your side looks a veritable Guru<sup>1</sup> in the true sense of the word. I am glad that the Government is giving a grant for the purchase of MSS. I had already proposed this matter when Lord Elgin was Governor, and advised the Government not to make the matter too public, as that raises the price of MSS. at once. Well, a beginning is made.

‘I have finished the Prātisākhya, and the translation is progressing.

<sup>1</sup> Teacher.

I have sent you and Bühler my second edition of Chips through the Government, also to Dr. Wilson.

‘Kind regards to Bühler. I have not heard from him for a very long time, but have just received his Āpastamba, which gives me much pleasure; it is an old friend of mine. What do you think of a Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum? Could that be done in Bombay? Bhao Dagi is sure to have much material. It ought really to be begun soon.’

TO THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

TAPLOW COURT, January 14, 1869.

‘It is certainly true that the religion of the Hindus, as far as we can gather it from their sacred hymns in the Veda, is free from everything that strikes us as degrading in the present state of religion and morality in India. But between the ancient religion of India and the religious worship of the present generation there have been several falls and several rises. Buddhism, in the sixth century before our era, was a reaction against the corruptions that had crept into the ancient religion even at that early time. Then Buddhism, starting with the highest aspirations, degenerated into monasticism and hypocrisy, and a most rigorous form of the old Brâhmanic religion took possession of India, and drove Buddhism out of every corner of the country. Since that time there have been several religious reforms, though of a more local character, and this makes it very difficult to generalize and treat the whole religious life of India as one organic body of religious thought. Yet so much may be said with perfect truth, that if the religion of India could be brought back to that simple form which it exhibits in the Veda, a great reform would be achieved. Something would be lost, for some of the later metaphysical speculations on religion, and again the high and pure and almost Christian morality of Buddha, are things not to be found in the Veda. But, as far as the popular conceptions of the deity are concerned, the Vedic religion, though childish and crude, is free from all that is so hideous in the later Hindu Pantheon.

‘With regard to the inevitable decay of religion, a difference ought to be made between two classes of religion, national and personal. There are ancient religions, like that of Greece, and that of India too, which grow up like national languages, when it is impossible to speak of individual influences, because all individual influence is determined by the silent and almost unconscious approval or disapproval of the community. In these religions I think we can watch for a time a decided progress, a gradual elimination of what is bad, i.e. what is not acceptable to the national conscience.

'But religions, like Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity too, belong to a different class. They start with a high ideal conceived by a representative man, representative either of a nation or of the whole of humanity, and that high ideal is hardly ever realized; it has to adapt itself to larger circles and lower levels, and can only be kept from utter degeneration by constant efforts at reform.'

TO M. MICHEL BRÉAL.

PARKS END, February 19.

'I knew you would be pleased at the result of the last election, but I was glad all the same to receive your congratulations, and to know that you approve of the choice of that distinguished body, which no doubt before long will count you among its members. To me it is the highest honour that could possibly be bestowed upon me. I believe I may honestly say it has been through life the only object of what you may call a foolish ambition. That I should obtain it so soon I did not expect, and I am afraid my success will secure me many dipsus, but I have long learned that no one does us so much service as our dipsus, nos amis les ennemis, and I do not think my head will be quite turned, as I know too well that "merit is the good opinion which our friends have of us," as Lord Palmerston used to say. I hope I shall have the pleasure of seeing you and making the acquaintance of Madame Bréal before this year is over. As soon as three books of mine which are now in the Press are finished, I hope to present them in person to the Academy. The Prâtisâkhya is finished, the first volume of the translation is printed as far as page 224, and there is a third little book printing, which is to be a surprise. I hope when I and my wife come to Paris, we shall find you in the full enjoyment of all the pleasures and treasures of a Grihastha. Many thanks for your Idées latentes du Langage, which I read at once with the greatest pleasure, as I do everything you write. You know how to prepare your meats, and do not expect your readers to eat raw flesh. M. Brachet's Grammar is out. Now that Parliament is sitting, there is little chance of getting a review, but I shall see what I can do. M. Harris is hard at work translating my Chips. There is an Italian translation coming out of my lecture on "Stratification." I need not say that the lecture is quite at your service, if you think a French translation would interest people in France. Schleicher's death is a very great loss to us, more even than Bopp's, who had finished his work.'

Max Müller found that incessant work was the only help in these months of anxiety, and, as is shown in the various letters, he had been far from idle. The first volume of Translations from the Vedic Hymns came out in May. His lectures this term were on 'Sanskrit Grammar as a Foundation for Philological Research.' In the following letter to Sir George Cox, he upholds Sanskrit and Comparative Philology as the necessary foundation for a study of Comparative Mythology:—

PARKS END, March 3, 1869.

'... I should like to see you and talk the matter of Comparative Mythology over with you. I cannot help feeling that you work at this subject under great difficulties, and I sometimes doubt whether you ought to give your principal energies to that subject. I speak to you quite openly, for I believe you would be offended if I did not. The most minute criticism of etymological coincidences seems to me the only safe foundation of Comparative Mythology. When there is no etymological foundation I should not venture to take a step, however clear the material coincidences of character, circumstances, and the general dénouement might be. I believe you have done good service by pointing out the necessity of admitting a common origin, even when the evidence of the common nomenclature is wanting, but I doubt whether with those principles it is safe to enter upon the treatment of the whole subject. The dangers are very great, and much harm may be done. And when you come to fables or stories of modern date, the dangers become still greater. Here there is an immense literature to master first, i.e. the historical and purely historical evidence of the migration of fables. When the ground has so far been cleared, there comes the labour of tracing back really old common Âryan stories to their roots, whether mythical or proverbial. If therefore you ask me, I tell you openly, do not make Comparative Mythology the principal work of your life, unless you make up your mind first to study Sanskrit and Comparative Philology. I believe you can do far more real and important work in other fields of research, though I should be very sorry if we were not from time to time to get hints and impetus from you on a subject where you certainly have seen beyond the horizon of other scholars. I am just printing a curious collection of Buddhist stories contained in Buddhaghosha's commentary on the Dhammapada, and therefore not later than about A.D. 400.'

Early in April he had all his children safe under his roof again, and it was soon evident that any summer plans must be made with reference to their health. The doctor prescribed a foreign bath, and it was finally settled that after Commemoration the whole family should go to Soden in the Taunus, where Max Müller's mother would join them.

Before leaving home Max Müller heard from his friend Dr. John Muir, from Edinburgh, that he had received the first volume of his Translations from the Vedic Hymns, 'in which you show a great deal of minute learning. But if you go into everything in the same elaborate way in future, you will require to live to the age of Methuselah to finish your task. I cannot but express the wish that you had translated more and annotated less; that you had given what the world expected from you, a translation at once scholarlike and elegant, and entering into the spirit of Vedic antiquity, exhibiting in short the results of profound research without much display of the apparatus of learning.' The same complaint was made by many other subscribers, and Max Müller soon found that his plan of translation was far too elaborate. A second volume was published, but not till many years later, as Vol. XLVI of the Sacred Books of the East, the volume already published, of which Dr. Muir complains, being reprinted with many additional Hymns as Vol. XXXII of that series, in place of another work of which Max Müller was disappointed. Some idea may be gained of the enormous labour bestowed on this volume of translations from the long list of works on the Veda which Max Müller had consulted, and to which he fully admits his indebtedness. The list fills six pages octavo. Max Müller held that the first translators of the Veda should be decipherers, 'bound to justify every word of the translation in exactly the same way in which decipherers of hieroglyphic or cuneiform inscriptions justify any step they take.'

In another letter Dr. John Muir expresses the wish that more light should be thrown on Buddha, and trusts that Max Müller intends to write more about him. This wish was fulfilled next year by the translation from the Pâli of Buddha's Dhammapada, or Path of Virtue, the book he alludes to in the letter to M. Bréal as 'a surprise.'

To M. REGNIER (former tutor to the Comte de Paris, and a distinguished Sanskritist).

PARKS END, OXFORD, May 13, 1869.

'MY DEAR FRIEND,—It is really very provoking to know that you are in England, and that it is impossible to effect a meeting. I have a lecture every day, and during the Whitsuntide holidays we have friends staying with us, and even if I could leave them for a day, I am kept here because the Archbishop of Canterbury, who is the Visitor of our College (All Souls), will be here from Saturday till Tuesday, and all the Fellows have to be in attendance. I cannot ask you to give me a day as I know how much your presence is valued by your old friends, but if you should by any fortunate chance find yourself free for a day, it would be a great treat to me and my wife to receive you at our house and show you our children, who, I am thankful to say, are either getting stronger or are really quite well again. Sunshine seems to have returned to our house with the spring, and at present there are few clouds to be seen, at least no more than we all want to make the sky really beautiful.

'I shall be busy here till about the end of June, and I hope then to go to Paris, though I am afraid I shall find few of my friends there. My plan was to take lodgings at St. Germain or some other place near Paris, and to settle there for some months with my wife and four children, taking our English nurse and a Swiss bonne with us. But this plan has become somewhat doubtful because my mother wishes to spend the summer with us in England, and in that case I should probably go to Paris alone and stay only for a fortnight, and then go to fetch my mother from Germany. Could you or Madame Regnier give us any hint as to where and how to settle ourselves near Paris, if we carry out our original plan?

'I am now printing my last volume (second edition, Sanskrit Grammar), of which I enclose the title. Prātisākhya and Rig-veda (translation) are finished, and I look forward with great pleasure to presenting my "thrins" to the Academy.

'I had a letter from M. Guizot, which I value more than many a cordon and crachat.'

Shortly before leaving for Germany, Max Müller offered Messrs. Longmans a translation of Coquerel's Apostles' Creed, an offer that was rejected, as Mr. Longman did not consider the book sufficiently orthodox. Against this opinion Max Müller protests in the following letter:—

OXFORD, June 24.

'MY DEAR LONGMAN,—I am sorry to hear that you think Coquerel's book would not sell, though, if it were of so startling a character as you imagine, I should think that it would excite some interest, and have even a commercial success.

'But allow me to say, that though I should not venture to criticize your judgement as far as the commercial success of the book is concerned, I must protest most strongly against the judgement you have formed of its religious character.

'The book is written in a liberal, but in a deeply religious spirit, teaching men to distinguish between the dead crust and the living kernel of Christianity, and warning them against throwing away what is true, eternal, and divine, because in course of time it has been surrounded and almost hidden by what is conventional, changeable, and human. It is an interpretation and historical vindication of the antiquated, almost unintelligible, and certainly widely misunderstood language of the so-called Apostles' Creed, a document which, I feel sure, no educated man and no clergyman in England would take to be the work of the Apostles. The book is written throughout in the most correct language, and there are passages in it which the most eloquent of our bishops need not be ashamed of in the pulpit.

'I write this, not because I wish you to publish the MS., but because I shall be truly sorry if you think I had offered you a book to publish which would shock people far more than anything you have published.'

TO THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

PARKS END, June 29, 1869.

'MY DEAR STANLEY,—That book of Jacolliot's<sup>1</sup> is as silly, shallow, impudent a composition as ever I saw. It is sad to think that people can still be taken in with such a book. Would you believe that Gladstone was reading it in the midst of the Irish debate! The book quotes from the Veda! The extracts are no more from the Veda than from the Koran. I felt so disgusted that I could read no more; and then people ask me to review such a book—they might as well ask me to fight a shoe-black!

'What I sent you as a first instalment of the Veda is real and old—of course no one will read that! Nor do I care. I meant to write an unreadable book, and I believe I have succeeded.

'But I shall soon send you something that is readable—a collection of Buddha's own sayings. I believe the final struggle between Buddhism and Christianity, whenever that comes to pass, will be a hard one, and will end in a compromise—there is a prophecy! that will have to be tested some thousand years hence—therefore, at all events, it is safe. But I am quite serious, and I know you would not refuse Buddha admittance at Westminster, after you have read his λόγια. How small the Irish Church looks from a more (ex)centric point of view, and that is the real charm and the real blessing of researches into the ancient history of thought and faith; they make one feel happy, quiet, and strong, like Scotch mountain air.'

<sup>1</sup> La Bible dans l'Inde.

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, July 9, 1869.

‘DEAR MR. GLADSTONE,—“Do not speak to the man at the helm” may, I suppose, be translated freely into “Do not write to the Prime Minister.” If I break this useful rule, it is only for one word of explanation. The volume which I took the liberty to send to you is hardly meant to be read; I know it is perfectly unreadable, except for Sanskrit scholars. It is, in fact, but the underground foundation on which the pillars are to rest which are to support the bridge on which people hereafter may walk across from the nineteenth century after to the nineteenth century before our era. At the same time I may say that the few Vedic Hymns which I have translated, or rather deciphered, in the first volume, are genuine relics of the earliest phase of human thought within our reach. Jacolliot’s book, La Bible dans l’Inde, which I looked at, is beneath criticism, it is simply untrue. The author has been deceived, has deceived himself, and tries to deceive others. I am sorry that my ticket for Antwerp is taken for next Thursday, and that I shall not be able to avail myself of your kind invitation to breakfast, or to carry off the book which you say is waiting for me.’

The book by Jacolliot, La Bible dans l’Inde, alluded to in the letters to Dean Stanley and Mr. Gladstone, was a mere imposture, the author purporting to have found the essential features of the Biblical narrative, the Garden of Eden, Flood, &c., given in the sacred books of the Brāhmans. Max Müller was in London one day during the debates on the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, when he heard a quick footstep behind him, and some one touched him on the shoulder. It was Mr. Gladstone. ‘Oh, why,’ exclaimed the Prime Minister, ‘have you not told us of these wonderful discoveries in India?’ and then poured forth, in the middle of St. James’s Street, his wonder and admiration of La Bible dans l’Inde, which he had been studying, when any less versatile statesman would have been entirely absorbed in his great Irish measure. It took some time, not only in St. James’s Street, but by letter, before Mr. Gladstone would give up his belief in Jacolliot’s nonsense.

The stay at Soden, dull in some ways, was made interesting to Max Müller by finding an old friend, Professor Hertz, whom he had not seen since they were students together at Leipzig. He was watching over a young daughter dying of decline, and, before they left Soden, Max followed his friend’s child to her last resting-place. His deep sympathy was a help and stay to the poor parents, and till he joined his loved child some years later, Professor Hertz often wrote, recalling the time at Soden and the intercourse with the friend of his youth. It was at Soden also that Max Müller first heard from Dr. Appleton, of St. John's College, his plans for starting the Academy. Max Müller had taken his whole party for an excursion to the ruins of Cronberg, on one of the hills of the Taunus range, and his children were revelling in the enjoyment of a complete day of holiday with their father, whose incessant work made such a treat a rare one. Dinner in the open air was just over, when Dr. Appleton was seen to descend from the coach running between Soden and Cronberg. He had arrived at Soden to find Max Müller gone out for the day, and, absorbed in his own schemes, did not hesitate to follow him and entirely engross him for the rest of the day, to the dismay of his children. When once started, Max Müller was a constant contributor to the Academy, till it changed hands, and entirely altered its character as a literary paper about two years before his death. From Soden the party went to Kiel, where the Platt-Deutsch poet Klaus Groth, with whom Max had formed an intimate friendship during the poet's visit to England a few years before, had secured a delightful apartment for them in one of the pretty villas that line the shores of the beautiful harbour of Kiel. It stood at the entrance to Düsternbrook, a fine beech forest, the trees of which hung over the water of the harbour. The garden of the villa ran down to the water, which is scarcely salt, and has little or no tide. Here a happy six weeks was spent, varied by long day excursions with Klaus Groth and his charming wife to all the most beautiful spots round Kiel. A two days' visit was paid to Plauen and the lakes of Holstein in one direction, whilst in another they visited Husum, 'the grey town on the grey (North) sea,' with its flat coast and dykes as in Holland, to make acquaintance with Theodor Sturm, another Platt-Deutsch poet. Later on, before leaving Kiel, Max Müller and his wife went to Copenhagen, with which they were delighted, enjoying the treasures of the Museum of Northern Antiquities, and the beautiful pictures of native Danish art in the palaces. They also visited Elsinore, and looked across to Sweden; the sea, the day they visited Elsinore, was alive with vessels waiting for a favourable wind to take them through the Sound into the Cattegat. The Max Müllers returned to Kiel by the Belts, and stayed a night at Schleswig to see the cathedral with its wonderful wood carvings of the fifteenth century.

During the stay at Kiel, the German Philological Congress held their annual meeting there, attended by people from all parts of Europe. Mark Pattison, Rector of Lincoln College, was present, M. Jules Oppert from Paris, and many others, and it gave Max Müller an opportunity of meeting many engaged in like studies with himself. He read his paper on Buddhist Nihilism referred to before (p. 192) and made his first speech in German at the farewell banquet.

Many evenings during the visit to Kiel were spent either at Klaus Groth's house, or at Forsteck, an exquisite place belonging to Herr Meyer, a Hamburg merchant, commanding a view of the broadest portion of the great Kieler Bucht, or estuary, where, at the time of the Crimean War, the whole English Baltic Fleet lay for weeks. On these occasions Klaus Groth always read out some of his Platt-Deutsch poems, which, to English ears, are more intelligible read aloud than when read to oneself: the strange spelling misleading the eye. The pleasure of the time at Kiel was greatly added to by the presence of a cousin, Captain, now General, Stockmarr, with his wife and daughter, who joined many of the expeditions. 'We have had many happy hours together,' writes Max to another cousin, whom he tried to draw to Kiel; but at that time the railway communication between Kiel and places on the Baltic shore was too complicated for short visits, especially where children were of the party. It was for this reason that his old friend Dr. Prowe, from Thorn in East Prussia, was unable to comply with Max's earnest wish for a meeting.

Early in October the whole party, including the mother, returned to Oxford, the two eldest children thoroughly restored to health. The lectures announced for this term were a continuation of the course on Sanskrit Grammar. Among the many letters waiting his return was an invitation from the Khedive of Egypt to be present at the opening of the Suez Canal, but he had to decline the honour, as taking him away too long from his work.

TO PROFESSOR BENFEY.

Translation.

PARKS END, OXFORD, November 7, 1869.

‘DEAR COLLEAGUE,—Having returned to England some three weeks ago, I had so many letters to answer that I only now find time to thank you for your valuable present. I have, so far, only glanced at your History of Philology, but even this glance has shown me how much material you have again accumulated in this work, and how useful and instructive your book is in every way. I hope soon to have time to read it quietly, but I feel I must not delay in sending you my best thanks.

‘My path did not lead me, alas! past Göttingen this time, and my hope of meeting you perchance at Kiel, at the Philological Congress, was not fulfilled. . . .

‘My first volume of the Veda translation has, I hope, reached you, and I should be glad to receive your opinion about it. According to my judgement there is only one scientifically justifiable method of interpreting the Veda, viz. to settle completely every word which raises the least doubt. The work is slow and laborious, but if it is not done you never come to a conclusion, and the same questions turn up again and again. Of course, for you and me there are certain things which do not need proofs, but we also made our way slowly through all this, therefore, why not save others this trouble? why not cut off, once for all, all unfounded objections at the outset?

‘I hope to send you soon a book on Buddha; that makes me think of your review of my Essays: accept my best thanks. . . . Alas! I have to get a new edition of my Sanskrit Grammar ready, which I should like to have done with. . . .’

The Christmas was passed in Oxford, a real German Christmas, with a tree, to which a few Germans in Oxford were invited, and at which the various German dishes and sweetmeats, imported by the old mother, bore a conspicuous part.

CHAPTER XVII

1870

Lectures on the Science of Religion. Keshub Chunder Sen. Franco-German War. LL.D. at Edinburgh. Letters to Dean Stanley. To 'the English People.' Work for Sick and Wounded. North Wales. Letters to Dr. Abeken and Mr. Gladstone. Chips, Vol. III.

THIS year, that was to be so full of stirring events, opened quietly for Max Müller, who began at once to prepare the lectures he had undertaken to give at the Royal Institution in February and March on the 'Science of Religion.'

TO DEAN STANLEY.

January 19.

'I return Clark's<sup>1</sup> letter. I quite feel with you that a man like Clark ought not to be satisfied with simply withdrawing; he ought to work and fight, and not look to others to carry a new Reformation. I do not know much of him, but all I do know of him makes me like him very much. His words would carry weight with many people. It might seem bold and imprudent in Temple, but still I think it would be right if, as a Bishop, he answered Clark's letter, and told him publicly that the Old Testament was not originally written in the language of the nineteenth century, but in old, heavy, poetical Oriental phraseology, and that, unless his difficulties extend far beyond the limits indicated by him, he might well continue to read the Ten Commandments, and afterwards preach a sermon, and tell his congregation, if they need to be told, that God never stood on a hill and opened His mouth to tell them in Hebrew what the still small voice had told Moses, and other prophets too, nay, everybody who would but listen to that voice, viz. that there are laws independent of man, nay, in spite of man, yet irresistibly present in the human conscience. . . . Then why not say, "God spake these words and said"? Is our nineteenth-century language so much better, and is it altogether free from imagery or idolism? I shall have to say much stronger things in my lectures, and I am not afraid. People know that there are far greater difficulties that must be met—downright atheism among the high and the low. It is so, I assure you, and you probably know it better than I. And then to hear people fight about Colenso's difficulties, as if true religion had anything to do with them, is disheartening. However, let us look to Rome and that hideous<sup>1</sup> performance which passes all mythology, and be thankful. Ever yours.'

<sup>1</sup> Public Orator at Cambridge.

The very title of the lectures at the Royal Institution excited opposition and criticism, many people objecting to the possibility of a scientific study of religions. They were, however, very well attended, but Max Müller purposely postponed the publication, hoping to make the lectures more complete, as it had been impossible to deal fully with so vast a subject in the narrow limits of four lectures. They were first published in 1873, and then only slightly enlarged, as Max Müller had found he could not give the necessary time to perfect them; but as they had been pirated in America, he was driven in self-defence to print them in England. The subject was subsequently carried out in his Hibbert and Gifford Lectures.

On March 20 he writes to tell his wife he had been offered the degree of LL.D. at Edinburgh. 'I really ought to take care not to have my head turned with all the honours; there is really nothing left that I care for now, and I sometimes think the course must soon be run and all the work over.'

The visit to Edinburgh had to be postponed to the summer, partly on account of the lectures, partly because his old mother was still with him.

TO HIS WIFE.

FROGMORE, March 31.

'One line to say that I arrived safe. At the station a carriage was waiting for me, but the Prince is in London, and will only be back in time for dinner. I am in my old room again, and all the servants seem to be the same as before, which is a good sign. Love to the mother, and kisses for the children. The Prince has just called me away.'

<sup>1</sup> The Doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin.

TO THE SAME.

FROGMORE, April 1.

‘We have just come back from London, where we had a very interesting luncheon at the Deanery. No one there but Keshub Chunder Sen and the Prince and I. We soon got into a warm discussion, and it was curious to see how we almost made him confess himself a Christian. He will come to Oxford, and then I hope to see more of him. He is not as handsome as Satyendranâth Tagore, but very intelligent and pleasing. Last night we had a dinner-party—the Dean of Windsor and Mrs. Wellesley, Colonel and Mrs. Gordon, who is a sister of Peel, the Fellow of All Souls, and Mr. Ruthven. We used to know him in the Berkshire Volunteers. The Princess is very kind, and asked after you and the children.’

This was Max Müller’s first acquaintance with Keshub Chunder Sen, which ripened into real friendship, and they corresponded till the death of the latter in 1884. Unfortunately all Max Müller’s letters to Keshub Chunder Sen, touching on the important work of the Brahma Somâj, seem to have been lost or destroyed.

Two public lectures were given at Oxford in the May Term—‘On the Origin of Mythology,’ and ‘On the Migration of Fables.’ The latter was repeated on June 3 at the Royal Institution. Max Müller writes to his wife, who was nursing her father:—

DEANERY, WESTMINSTER, June 4.

‘I believe my lecture (“On the Migration of Fables”) went off very well; the place was as full as it could hold. But I lost all heart for it when you were not there. I must go to Oxford to-day, as Keshub Chunder Sen waits for me at the station.

‘Dr. Scott has accepted the Deanery of Rochester, and Jowett will be Master of Balliol. I am truly glad, for though it comes late it will make up for many years of disappointment. Few people know what it is to see the work which one could do best taken away from one, and few people make allowance for it, and how it embitters one. I do like to see things come right in the end, though I know they are always right even if we do not see it. I do not think that Jowett’s friends have always thought of what he has suffered, and I trust he will have many years to enjoy his Mastership.’

TO PROFESSOR FREEMAN.

June, 1870.

‘I have read your second and third lectures<sup>1</sup>, and I have no remarks to make beyond what I said about your first lecture, that I hope they will be taken to heart. I sometimes wonder that it should be necessary to say these things again and again, but I believe the confusion in the popular mind arises chiefly from a confusion of terminology, using a terminology which was meant for linguistic purposes for historical or physiological work. Let people classify blood as much as they like, only let them use their own bottles for that, and not bottles that were labelled for the purpose of holding languages. I confess to my mind blood is an irrational and ungraspable quantity, but if people like to dabble in it, let them have their sanguinary amusement. I also confess that I consider all historical notices as to race extremely precarious until you come to writers of our own century. Before Caesar no one knew the difference between a Celt and a German, as little as many of our missionaries know the difference between a Hottentot and Bushman, or between a Tatar and Mongolian. Nearly all that is built on the statements of the ancients as to race, is built on sand; it may be very learned, but it will not stand a breath of harsh criticism. One thing I cannot understand. Who has invented the Iberians? I see them of late cropping out here, there, and everywhere. Whoever brought them to England first? It is by no means easy to get a clear idea what the ancients meant by the Iberians in Spain, and whether that name may be used synonymously with Bask. But the historical Iberians or Ebro-people of Spain never came to England, except at the time of the Armada or thereabouts. And least of all would they explain the black colouring matter among the English, for according to Napier and Prichard the Basks are fair, their eyes blue, grey, bluish, and light brown, never dark brown. Some observations are different, and give us twenty-five brown against twenty-one blue eyes, and this is used as an argument in favour of a theory that the Basks came from two distinct ethnological stems. In some places the people with blonde hair form a decided majority. As to the skulls, the confusion is equally great; see Pruner Bey, Sur les crânes basques, 1867. Then what use can the Iberians be in England? People who believe that the Iberians came to England to introduce a dark pigment, will soon believe that the Buddhists came over from India to build Stonehenge.’

And now for nearly a year to come Max Müller’s heart and thoughts were to be absorbed by the great Franco-German

<sup>1</sup> ‘History of the Cathedral Church of Wells.’

War. When able to fix his attention on his work he went on with the fifth volume of the Rig-veda, and was busy in preparing a third volume of Chips for the Press, of which an edition of 3,000 was printed; while this year also saw the publication of his translation of the Dhammapada.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

July 17, 1870.

‘These last experiences are terrible; one cannot bear to think of it. A murderous attack just because it seems necessary to the Emperor to make himself popular with his army. The feeling in England is strong against France. I do not for a moment doubt the result. Germany may lose some battles, but Germany cannot be killed. The present devil’s brood in France will fall after one lost battle. There is perhaps nothing better for the ultimate consolidation of Germany than this war, for no one who speaks German, be he Hanoverian or Saxon, can hold himself aloof. It is the last chance for Austria. If she is great enough to forget the past and to join Prussia against France her future is secured; if she follows Beust’s policy now she is done for. Who knows how long this war may last? I should like to live to see the end. The enthusiasm in Germany must be tremendous; all the young Germans in England are leaving, and I would gladly go with them. All my plans are, of course, upset. I hoped to go to Ems in August, and then we might have met, but one cannot think of that now. It is not really necessary, but it did me such good before that I would have used it as a precaution. Now we shall stay quietly here. On August 1 I have to go to Edinburgh to be made an honorary doctor. I put it off once, and cannot do so again. Later on we may go to the sea, but that is uncertain. My assistant, Dr. Thibaut, received a telegraphic despatch to-day, and is already on the way to Rastadt, which of course disturbs my work a good deal.’

The following letter adverts to a scheme that Max Müller had much at heart at one time, but it led to no practical results in England:—

TO WILLIAM LONGMAN, ESQ.

OXFORD, July 12.

‘What I talked about with Mr. Cox was not a volume of essays, but something very different. I shall try to explain it to you as shortly as I can.

‘In Germany the plan has been adopted for some years of publishing a continuous series of lectures and essays, and it seems to have answered well, and gradually to take the place of monthly and quarterly journals.

'In a Monthly or Quarterly you must print many articles which are mere padding; the publisher has to pay for them, and the buyer has to pay for them, though neither one nor the other wants to have them. For instance, if a man wants to have my four lectures on the "Science of Religion" he must pay 10s., and then he has to cut them out, and they look untidy.

'Now if there existed a "series of essays," each essay might be sold for 1s. or less, and people would then be able to get what they really want. Those who now subscribe to Quarterlies would subscribe to the whole series; those who want the Physical Science only would take those numbers only which treat of Physical Science, &c.

'You would want about six names to represent the different branches of knowledge, who should be responsible for the character of the essays, and give a character to the series. I have spoken to Huxley and others, and find a general concurrence.

'You will probably object that it would be troublesome and expensive as a matter of publishing. But, on the other hand, it gives you a constant means of advertising. The series itself would hardly require more advertising than a Quarterly: you would give a string of titles from time to time.

'I should propose as a title for the series "Our Time, a series of essays and lectures, under the editorship of 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6." One series in Germany, "Populäre Vorträge," has reached to several hundreds of essays. In France you have something like it in the Revue des Cours Littéraires, only that that is published every month, while my plan is to publish whenever there is fresh material.

'I am not a man of business, but I thought that Mr. Cox might act as a general editor, supported by six special editors, whose names would be a guarantee with the public.'

TO THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

PARKS END, OXFORD, July 24.

'I send you a copy of my lectures on the "Science of Religion." I do not wish to publish them now, but I had sixteen copies taken, of which yours is one. By-and-by they will form part of a larger work, if life and strength last long enough to enable me to carry out a plan for which all my studies have formed the preparation.

'My heart is too full to say anything about this terrible war. I believe it is a cup that could not pass. France cannot break a united and strong Germany, and the reckless gambler who usurps the throne of France took advantage of this national jealousy to save himself from his inevitable end for a few years longer. But the misery it brings to thousands of happy homes passes all description! This war can only end either in the destruction of Germany, or in a revenge without a parallel in history.'

TO THE SAME.

PARKS END, OXFORD, July 26, 1870.

'I feel by no means quite happy about the "Traité de paix entre la France et la Prusse." If it is genuine, however, then neutrality on the part of England would be criminal. Even Turkey came forward to assist her enemy Greece when it became a question of putting down brigandage. England and Germany hunted down one Corsican—they ought to combine for the same purpose now. You may have watched the feelings of those who lost a husband, a brother, a son, or a friend in the tragedy of Marathon; multiply that feeling by millions, and you may imagine then what the state of Germany must be at the present moment, when every family trembles for the life of those whom they love most, and who are to be mowed down by the French cannon, simply because one great criminal has been driven mad and desperate. War in Germany is different from war in England. It was easy for the Duke of Wellington to preach moderation at Paris. He had to revenge defeat, but no outrages, whilst every German soldier that marches into Paris (and I trust I shall live to see it!) has to revenge the blood of brothers, and tears such as only a mother can shed. I should like to see England, not Russia, as the friend and ally of Germany in this holy war.'

At the end of July Max Müller went to Edinburgh, to receive the degree of LL.D. at the same time as his friend Dr. Acland. The few days' holiday refreshed and cheered him, weighed down as he was by the thought of the war, and all that was at stake for his native country. He wrote to his wife:—

EDINBURGH, July 31.

'This town is glorious and inspiring, the true capital of England, far more royal than London. Were I King, I should reside here and leave London to be the great harbour and emporium of the country.'

The following is Professor Macpherson's speech in presenting Max Müller for the degree of LL.D. :—

'I have now to present to you in the name of the Senatus, as one deemed worthy of the same degree, another very eminent Professor in the University of Oxford—Max Müller. I do not think it necessary to mention any of the numerous University honours which he has received, or to give you a catalogue of the great literary and scientific societies that have sought to do themselves honour by enrolling him amongst their members. His name is too well known among us to require such an enumeration. Those who have not had the pleasure of listening to his delightful lectures in this city know him well through his writings. In the University of Oxford he has done more, probably, than any other man to establish the study of modern languages in what used to be considered the throne of the dead languages; and he did so at a period when he was engaged in giving to the world writings which were composed in a language which was dead long before Greek and Latin, I may say, were born. When England was engaged in the Crimean War, it was Max Müller who supplied English ignorance by writing upon the languages of the seat of war. When philologists were beating about, seeking here and there some solution or explanation of the endless facts which had been accumulating for half a century, it was Max Müller who came forward with his Science of Language. And now, when England is agitated with discussions on religious faiths and religious doctrines, Max Müller again steps forward with his Science of Religion, his lectures upon which bear all the impress of his learning and his genius, and breathe a spirit of religious love and toleration, which, if it could be extended to other religious discussions, would take from them the reproach of acrimony which has so often been cast upon them. It is a remarkable circumstance, considering the great stake which Britain has in the East, that it was left to Max Müller to bring in a worthy shape before the world the text of the Rig-veda—the value of which is acknowledged by all scholars and by all thinkers throughout the world. As to the manner in which he has done so, a verdict of approval has been pronounced by the scholars of all Europe; and as to his acquaintance with Eastern religious systems, the best testimony to that is the appreciation which his work has received from the Brahmins of India, who revere the name of Max Müller, thank him for his labours, and regard him as the great exponent of their religious doctrines in Europe. With regard to his qualifications for the performance of such a task, I know of no man who could have combined with these qualities the power of generalization which he possesses, the power of detecting truth beneath the accumulations of mythology and beneath the decay of tongues, the power of educing principle and order where apparently there is nothing but confusion and chaos. It is the combination of these qualifications which has enabled him to render such incomparable service to the Science of Comparative Philology and Comparative Mythology, and which has made him conspicuous both as a discoverer and as a presenter in the most interesting and popular form of the results of the labours and discoveries of others. No man has done so much to raise these to the dignity of a science; no man has done so much to popularize topics which formerly were considered fit for discussion only in the closet; and he has done this without departing from the method of severe scientific treatment: he has done it by the charm of the manner in which, in a pure and lucid English which the natives of his adopted country do sincerely envy while they rejoice to read it, he presents an endless array of facts in new and surprising combinations. In a word, his edition of the Rig-veda, his lectures upon the "Science of Language," and his lectures upon the "Science of Religion," place him in the very foremost rank of scholars and of thinkers, whether as regards extent of knowledge, or force and originality of speculation.'

Max Müller always felt at Edinburgh, and later at Glasgow, the stimulating influence of intercourse with men ready to talk on the subjects in which they were engaged, and to which they had devoted their lives, and contrasted it with the fear of 'talking shop' that prevails in England. On his return he was again absorbed in the war, and all the work in his house for the sick and wounded.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

August 14.

'You can fancy all our thoughts are with Germany, and I wish I were there. Such a triumph of a good cause has seldom been seen in history. Where are Adolf and Fritz<sup>1</sup>? I hope on the Rhine, perhaps already in France. The English are quite amazed at these results, and not quite pleased, but that does not matter. G. collects and works. She has collected already £100, and shrinks from no trouble. Here large collections are being made. That Emilie is still so angry with Germany astonishes me; the heart of every German must beat with joy, and all must be forgotten that recalls the old misery.'

TO E. A. FREEMAN, ESQ.

August 14.

'I ought to have written to you before, but you may imagine where all my thoughts are just now. Though I never doubted of ultimate success, I was afraid of reverses in the beginning. Now I expect the war will soon be over, and what I looked forward to for the last eighteen years almost every day as I opened the paper—the downfall of the Empire—has come to pass at last. A more demoralized and demoralizing government than that of Louis Napoleon, history I believe has seldom known. There will be a national bankruptcy too, I have no doubt, and millions of French money will be found in the English funds. Peace will be easy, for Germany wants no conquests, not even Alsace and Lorraine; the land is fine enough, but the people are not worth having. Perhaps France will in future be less eager to guarantee the status quo of Germany! Now about the Illyrians; though I do not like to quote my own books, I think I can answer your questions best if for the Illyrians I refer you to a tolerably full account of them in my Survey of Languages, second edition, pp. 50–60, and as to the untrustworthiness of classical authorities for ethnological purposes, to a note in my Lectures on the Science of Language, Volume I, p. 130.'

<sup>1</sup> Soldier cousins.

TO THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

PARKS END, OXFORD, August 23, 1870.

'Yes, these are great days, almost overpowering events. If all goes well, and if the author of this atrocious war is punished, people even in England will believe again that there is a God in history. I tremble for the Crown Prince—the French will fight with fury when they fight pro aris et focis, and not for glory and empire. I think we ought on the whole to be satisfied with the state of public feeling in England. Unfortunately Gladstone's mind has taken hold of the idea of neutrality, and squeezed it and defined it till it means abdication of the right of judging between right and wrong, between war and murder. This is a most demoralizing policy, but it cannot be helped now. All liberal and independent thinkers are caught in Gladstone's ministerial net. I wish Goldwin Smith were in England—some such man is wanted just now.

'I do not wonder that there is a feeling of mistrust with regard to Bismarck. In home politics he is as bad as Lord —— would be, if he were Prime Minister. But one may oppose a man as a Minister without despising him, and the same Minister, however self-willed and tyrannical at home, may be the right man as Foreign Minister. I do not love Bismarck, but I feel prepared to defend every step he has taken since 1866 against all comers. He seems to have been sans reproche, though no doubt also sans peur. If he was a bird of the same feather as Benedetti, why should he have opposed the Emperor if, by merely shutting his eyes, he could have got all he could possibly want for Germany, and at the same time entangle England and France in a war? If Bismarck is to blame in his foreign policy, every German patriot shares his blame. We wanted to be united, and we have had the naïveté to think, as the French papers say, that we could arrange our internal affairs without consulting France. If France thinks she has a right to interfere at Rome, at Madrid, and now at Berlin too, she must learn that this cannot be. France has been cruelly treated by the Emperor—how extraordinary that there should be no man to take his place, and to save France!

'We have collected about £120 at Oxford, though nearly everybody is away. My wife has a regular workshop going on all day long, making bandages, &c. &c. Did Lady Augusta receive my book for Princess Louise, or came it too late?'

TO THE SAME.

PARKS END, OXFORD, August 30.

'... I cannot tell you how this war crushes me. I sometimes feel as if I could bear it no longer and must be off. What savages we are in spite of all these centuries! But surely the Teutonic race is better than the Latin and Slavonic, and the Protestants are better Christians than the Romans; and the German cause is surely thoroughly righteous, and the French thoroughly unrighteous. I always think of the simple soldiers—those who were everything at home, and are nothing in the field of battle—unknown, unnoticed, and probably better and braver than emperors and kings and generals. I cannot get my thoughts away from them.'

On August 29 Max Müller wrote the first of his five letters in the Times addressed 'to the English People.' They were reprinted, together with letters from Mommsen, Strauss, and Carlyle, in a small volume, early in 1871, and sold for the good of the Victoria Institute for German Widows and Orphans. The first letter was called forth by a violent attack made by his old and honoured friend, Sir Harry Verney, on the policy of Germany, accusing Bismarck of having been willing to accept Holland, and give up Belgium and Switzerland to France. Such had been more or less Benedetti's scheme, but it is well known now that Bismarck did not listen to these ideas. Max Müller was no admirer of Bismarck, but he felt bound, much as he disliked the unconstitutional proceedings that had marked his internal government, to protest against this attack on his public honour.

TO DR. ABEKEN (then acting as Bismarck's secretary) <sup>1</sup>.

Translation.

OXFORD, September 9.

'I send you enclosed cuttings, but doubt whether you will receive them in these chaotic times. If you do receive my letter, it is to tell you that here also a German heart beats full of pride and joy, and often with pain, when it thinks of the friends who have dreamt of this great time of Germany's elevation, but who have not lived to see it realized.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

September 11.

'What great times we live in! though so far away, I can hardly keep myself quiet; one lives on newspapers and telegrams. And then I had so much work that had to be done, that I was at last quite exhausted from excitement and work, and went alone for a week to Brighton. The sea air and bathing did me great good, and I came back on Thursday. G.'s father was here on a visit, so G. could not go with me, though she needs change, and I think in a few days we shall make a little tour together in Wales. You have no idea how hard G. has worked. She will tell you all she has collected. . . . The feeling in Germany must be very sad, in spite of the mighty results, for what terrible sorrow there must be throughout the country! Here in England feelings are much divided. I have fought fiercely in the Times, and I think it has told. The best part of the nation is for Germany, but the aristocracy has strong sympathy with France. People are amazed at the gigantic resources of Germany, and the utter moral rottenness of France. Well, in the next few weeks Paris will be won; then our troops will march home. Alsace and Lorraine will be governed militarily, and in France they can then slaughter themselves as they like.'

TO MONCURE CONWAY, ESQ.

September 14.

'My wife has been collecting as much as she could get, and I know from letters received that her collection has done real good to the sufferers in different hospitals. You know that German hospitals are full of French wounded, and I believe if any distinction is made between the French and German wounded in these hospitals, it is in favour of the French. Anyhow, in the presence of death, nationality vanishes and humanity takes its place. My wife begs me to say that she will gladly forward any sum however small. She has more appeals than she can respond to. I should pay no attention to newspaper rumours as to what the Germans mean to do with regard to the conditions of peace. The King's behaviour towards the Emperor is mistaken chivalry towards a fallen enemy, nothing more. I think, however, that there ought to be a formal abdication, or a formal decree of a Constituent Assembly transferring the sovereign power from the Emperor to the Provisional Government, or to a President ; otherwise it seems impossible to make a treaty of peace. I believe the general opinion in Germany requires no territorial aggrandizement, but the military authorities will probably require a better strategic frontier line, which Germany asked for at the Congress of Vienna, but which she could not obtain then, owing to the intrigues of Austria and Russia. If the inhabitants of that district are devoted to France, and cannot bear the idea of belonging again to Germany, they are free to emigrate. Surely patriotism has made greater sacrifices than this.'

<sup>1</sup> Dr. Abeken had been a great friend of Baron Bunsen, at whose house Max Müller had learnt to know and estimate this upright, single-minded man at his right value.

During September Max Müller heard from his old friend Stanislas Julien, the famous Sinologue, in a state of almost childish panic at the approach of the German armies. He had recently lost his wife. Max Müller at once offered him an asylum under his roof ; but the old man, though vivement touché at his friend's invitation, resolved to stay and guard his precious library and house, on which he had spent large sums, and he went through all the sufferings of the siege. But it undermined his health, and he died about two years later.

TO MONCURE CONWAY, ESQ.

PARKS END, September 16, 1870.

'I read your letter with great interest. I believe you are quite right in your estimate of Bismarck, but I think you underrate the capacities of the King. The King is a strange mixture ; he was a mere soldier, but he learnt much during his long stay in Bunsen's house. He will never be guilty of such folly as to reinstate Napoleon ; but the situation is difficult. Suppose Paris surrendered, which I trust it will do after the first shot, what can the German army do but go into winter quarters in Alsace and Lorraine ? There may be a provisional treaty of peace, but it seems to me that, as the Constituent Assembly is convoked, it can be ratified by that Assembly and its delegates only. If the Constituent Assembly should fail, then nothing remains but to convoke the Legislative Assembly and the Senate, both of which still exist both de jure and de facto. I confess I cannot understand the enthusiasm for the French Republic. A republic is perhaps the most perfect form of government, but also the most difficult. There are good and there are bad republics, and the present French Republic seems to me the most imperfect political organization that can be imagined. I should prefer the Russian or the Chinese régime to the present state of things in France. It seems to me that the enthusiastic admirers of this republic, which has nothing but the name of a republic, exceed in folly the old Legitimists, to whom a King, however foolish and wicked, is a kind of idol to be worshipped with unquestioning devotion. It is very possible that Alsace might recover itself and become German, but I doubt whether it is wise to weaken France at the very moment that Germany becomes so much more powerful. As to making France harmless, that can never be done, and I doubt whether, for the sake of Germany, it is desirable. I hope Moltke will take as little as possible, and Bismarck will make it quite clear that what is taken is taken for strategic purposes only, and not for the sake of aggrandizement, and in order to recover some few millions who formerly were Germans. I hope you will publish your impressions of the war and Bismarck.'

TO THE SAME.

PARKS END, September 18, 1870.

'I did not know that the description of the battle of Rezonville in the Daily News was yours, and I am glad to hear that we shall have it in a more permanent form in next Fraser. I do not expect that anybody will see such fighting again, though, from what I see in the French papers, there will be, I fear, some mad attempt of fighting in and around Paris. The worst effect of Imperialism is that it has stunted a whole generation, and there is hardly one man who towers a head above the mob. They have no statesmen, and Jules Favre himself is reported to have declared that he could not make peace because his life would not be safe! Is that statesmanlike or soldierlike? Prévôt Paradol would not have said that! It is fearful to see such a country as France so entirely demoralized, abandoned, ruined; it will take generations to build her up again. Circumstances so exceptional as the present state of France would seem to justify exceptional measures on the part of the other Powers. England will not act alone, and unfortunately there is no cordial feeling between England and the United States. Besides, Mr. Motley is, I suppose, no longer Minister. What I should like to see would be a journey of Mr. Gladstone and Motley to the head quarters of the King of Prussia. They would be able to arrange a peace without a single threat, for Germany is as anxious for peace as France is, and they might lay the foundations of a league between the three Teutonic Powers that would be a guarantee of peace for centuries. France would listen to America, Germany to England, and England and America would be drawn together again by the good work which they would do in common. Bismarck is quite powerful enough to make Germany feel ashamed of any wish of territorial aggrandizement; and all that Moltke wants are the house-door, the bolt and keys of Germany. I shall have to run away from Oxford for a few weeks before term begins, and I hope to be off by Tuesday for North Wales.'

TO THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

CARNARVON, September 30, 1870.

'MY DEAR STANLEY,—I was so overdone that I ran away to Wales. We had splendid weather, and enjoyed our rambles immensely. Alas! the English Government is weaker than I expected; they do not seem to perceive that, since the destruction of the Western Empire, nothing like the present events has happened. Germany would be thankful for a little friendly coercion, but what Germany expected was a recognition of the righteousness of her cause, a fact now admitted by France, but not yet by England, except by Lord Russell. This kind of neutrality demoralizes England, and blunts the edge of her moral conscience. I expected something very different from Gladstone.'

The end of September the Max Müllers, both tired out with work for the sick and wounded, spent a delightful fortnight in North Wales, climbing Cader Idris and Snowdon, and exploring each lovely valley.

Scarcely had they settled quietly at home than the work began again, and Max Müller found himself involved on all sides in long correspondence on the subject filling his heart as well as his thoughts.

TO DR. ABEKEN.

Translation.

PARKS END, OXFORD, October 6, 1870.

'DEAR SIR AND FRIEND,— . . . Gladstone is the soul of the Cabinet, a man of slow resolution, but of inflexible will if once the resolution has been made. As far as I know him, he is on our side, not from natural sympathy, but from conviction, from a feeling of right and of duty. He was the only Minister who recognized our right in the Danish question, and who called the Treaty of London a bad continuation of the Vienna treaties. His sympathies are more Latin than Teutonic, as you know, and the commercial prosperity of France had so dazzled him, that he declared hardly a year ago that France would grow to be the Queen of Europe. It will be difficult for him and for many Englishmen to take in the new position of the world calmly and from the right point of view; but he is nearly the only English statesman whose stern uprightness I have never doubted, and who is so entirely guided by noble motives even where he makes mistakes.

‘I intend writing to Gladstone, somewhat to this effect:—

‘1. The thought of conquest of territory and the acquisition of non-German subjects is foreign to us.

‘2. It is a fate which Germany has not brought about, that has brought Alsace and Lorraine into the possession of the German army.

‘3. No prince and no statesman in Germany is strong enough to give up again for any price a possession so dearly bought.

‘4. The settling of the boundary requires no Congress or diplomatic understanding. It is a purely military question, and in consequence can only be decided by a Military Commission. Germany does not wish for any Frenchmen, nor for one inch of country, only what is indispensable to her future security.

‘I am writing this in a great hurry to catch the post.

‘Well, once more: do not give any weight to the anti-German outbreaks of the English Press; they come mostly from a French and Old-Danish source.

‘The republican sympathies are absurd, and only help us and do no harm. Sir H. Verney has improved, but not enough yet: he is getting old.

‘The collections in England are beautiful, larger than for their own patriotic funds after the Crimean War. A recognition on the side of Germany, especially before the French do so, would have a good effect, and might be a good occasion of mentioning some useful truths.’

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, October 6, 1870.

‘MY DEAR MR. GLADSTONE,—If you knew what an effort it has been to me not to write to you on some of the events of the last months, you would require no assurance of my readiness to answer, as well as I can, the inquiries contained in your letter of October 4, which I received this morning. I have no hesitation in asserting that the conquest of territory inhabited by people that are not German in national sentiment is an idea repugnant to the German mind. Count Bismarck, whose power arises chiefly from his accurate knowledge of the German character, and who is simply carrying out with the prudence and courage of a statesman what all German patriots have been yearning for during the last fifty years, would never venture on a war of conquest. The tradition that Alsace and Lorraine belonged once to Germany has never been forgotten by the people. German statesmen claimed these provinces in 1815, but Russia supported France in resisting their claim. One of our most popular German poets, Max von Schenkendorf, who died in 1817, wrote :—

“Doch dort in den Vogesen
Liegt ein verlornes Gut,
Da gilt es, deutsches Blut
Vom Höllenjoch zu lösen.”

But an offensive war against France, to recover that “lost patrimony,” would have been impossible in Germany.

‘Events, however, have happened for which Germany is not responsible. France has attacked Germany with the avowed purpose of annexing German soil. The French army has been beaten back, and the German army, in pursuing the enemy, finds itself in actual possession of Alsace and Lorraine. The sacrifices on the part of Germany have been enormous : there is hardly a German family from the Vistula to the Rhine which is not in mourning. It is a mercy that there have been no German reverses, and that the atrocities of former French invasions have not been repeated. There would have been a feeling of righteous anger and fury before which no stone would have remained upon another at Paris. It is a mercy that this feeling of revenge does not exist. But a new current of national feeling has sprung up in Germany, which rests simply on facts, and which no King, no Minister, would be able to resist. Alsace, they say, is ours, and our sons shall not have died in vain. The thousands and thousands of German hearts that lie buried in Alsace and Lorraine have made that soil German once more. Were Prussia to yield Strassburg and Alsace, she would cease to be Prussia.

‘In answer to your first question, therefore, I have no doubt that Count Bismarck did say what M. Jules Favre reported him to have said, that, whether the inhabitants of Alsace hate us or no, we shall hold Alsace for Germany.

‘You say “it would surprise you to find that I thought these people could properly be annexed to Germany, if their heart is in France as their country.” My answer is this. To conquer a province for the sake of territorial aggrandizement, and to annex people who do not wish to be annexed, would be an outrage of the moral sense of Europe. This is what France intended to do. To hold a hostile province which has been conquered in a defensive war, and with it the people who inhabit that province, is an evil, I grant, but it may be a necessary evil, and it can never be a crime. Anyhow, a culprit who is sent to prison has no right to complain that he is being annexed. I say nothing of the language of Alsace and Lorraine, for the annexation, if it takes place, does not take place on linguistic grounds. I say nothing of the friendly or unfriendly feeling of the people, for the annexation is not advocated on sentimental grounds.

‘The annexation is the result of a war forced upon Germany, and the occupation of French territory must be justified on military and strategic grounds. Germany is determined to make herself as safe against France as she can make herself, and no Power in Europe would gainsay her right, nay, her duty, to do what she considers best for her future security.

‘The frontier line that is to protect Germany against France can hardly be considered a matter to be settled by a Congress of diplomats: it can be properly settled by a Military Commission only. Count Bismarck knows perfectly well that a disaffected province is no addition to the strength of a country, but he would probably bow to the judgement of Count Moltke in determining the positions that seem best to secure the safety of Germany. On such points, however, the opinion of military authorities from other countries might justly claim to be heard, and might induce the German strategists to draw the line so as to include as little as possible of purely French soil, and to annex as few as possible of purely French inhabitants. The question of Luxemburg might possibly be reopened and facilitate arrangements in Alsace and Lorraine. I believe that the statements of the hostile feeling pervading all classes of society in Alsace are exaggerated. It is true that I judge from the accounts published by German travellers; but they were published before the war, and when no one thought of annexation. As to accurate statistics, they are to be found in R. Böckh, Der Deutschen Volkszahl und Sprachgebiet, Berlin, 1870. The German portion of Alsace comprises half a million inhabitants, that of Lorraine 297,500, of which one-ninth part has become French during the last two centuries. The German inhabitants of Alsace and Lorraine, though they were never considered as the equals of true Frenchmen, have no doubt been greatly humoured by the French Government; and as long as France was “La Grande Nation,” and Germany no nation at all, it was easy to rouse a feeling of pride among the Alsacians, not against Germany, which did not exist, but against the petty nationalities of Baden, Hesse, Wurtemberg, Bavaria, &c. In future, when France will be no longer “La Grande Nation,” though always “une grande nation,” the idea of being a German, and not a Frenchman, will be less intolerable than heretofore.

‘And if there are people in the annexed portions of Alsace and Lorraine who cannot bear the idea of belonging to Germany, surely it is not too much to expect from their patriotism that they should follow the example of thousands of German families which emigrated to Philadelphia when Alsace was annexed to France. When the flower of a nation is ready to die for their country, those who have the option of emigrating from Alsace to France proper are not so greatly to be pitied.

‘My great anxiety through all this war has been the unfriendly feeling that is springing up between England and Germany. The whole future of the world seems to me to depend on the friendship of the three Teutonic nations, Germany, England, and America. If Germany is estranged from England, she must become the ally of France and Russia, which would mean another century of imperialism and despotism. Can nothing be done to heal the breach?’

TO DR. ABEKEN.

Translation.

October 7, 1870.

‘... The idea of a Congress is ridiculous, but it is much liked, especially among the diplomatists, though Gladstone does not care for it. . . . He would like to treat the matter more from a military point of view. A Military Commission would deal with the question in a more technical way, and there would be less talk about France’s dishonour, and such-like phrases. Should the question about Luxemburg come up again, it would be a most natural thing to invite the Powers concerned to a Military Conference. Of course I understand nothing of all these matters, and I only speak as a member of the Parliament of “public opinion.” The only thing for which I feel useful, and perhaps have been of use, is to keep up the good feeling between England and Germany. If this is also your purpose, please consider me at your service at any time. Ever yours.

‘Is there no quicker way to Versailles than via Berlin?’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

October 9.

‘Though you wish for no congratulations on your birthday, I must still write to you, to comfort you in your loneliness. Many, many who used to meet you on this day with joy, are gone before you, and you miss their presence which you so enjoyed. But they are lost to your sight only, not to your heart, and that which really belonged to you in them, can never be lost to you. Our life here is not our own work, and we know that it is best for us all, just as it is. We ought to bear it, and we must bear it; and the more patiently, yes, the more joyfully we accommodate ourselves to it, the better for us. We must take life as it is, as the way appointed for us, and that must lead to a certain goal. Some go sooner, some later, but we all go the same way, and all find the same place of rest. Impatience, gloom, murmurs, and tears do not help us, do not alter anything, and make the road longer, not shorter. Quiet resignation, thankfulness, and faith help us forwards, and alone make it possible to perform the duties which we all, each in his own sphere, have to fulfil. May God, who has laid many burdens on you, give you the courage to bear them quietly to the end. The darker the night, the brighter the stars in the heavens.

‘We have had a delightful time in North Wales, walking everywhere, as if we were as young as ten years ago. I wish Emilie had come to England, as she could not go to Paris; though, if she has no feeling for this wonderful uprising of the German Fatherland, we should not have had much peace together, for I can think of hardly anything else, and G. is more German even than I am. Even for you it must be glorious to have lived to see these great events. The sacrifice is great and terrible, but it has not been in vain. Peace cannot be far off. The French are already becoming reasonable, and should be thankful to have a province like Alsace, only half French and once entirely German, which they can give up without shame; the shame for them is in quite a different direction, not in the punishment, but in the light-hearted folly of which they must now pay the cost.

‘We have still a little money by us, if anything special is wanted, and plenty of warm things for the winter. The collections in England have been splendid. Why do the people in Germany abuse England so? They could not expect England to go to war, and that export of arms is nothing. Such snarling is unworthy of Germany.’

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, October 9.

‘DEAR MR. GLADSTONE,—I wish the French could be made to see that there is no dishonour in taking the punishment which this war has brought on them. If Jules Favre can bring himself to call the war criminal, can he wish the crime to go unpunished, or does he think that such a crime can be atoned for by a mere fine? Jules Favre and all who protested against the war may well say, “Delicta maiorum immeritus lues, Romane,” &c., &c.’

TO MR. BELLOWS.

PARKS END, October 11.

‘I was glad to hear so promising an account of your little Max. I have a little boy some three years old, and I imagine, just like you, there is nothing like him. I am sorry to hear of the interruption of your Dictionary. I shudder when I think of Paris. I spent some happy years there, and have still several old friends living there, and to think of that town being bombarded! And yet what is the German army to do? and is not every one of the thousands of people that have been killed more precious than the whole of Paris?’

TO DR. ABEKEN.

Translation.

PARKS END, OXFORD, October 11, 1870.

‘DEAR SIR AND FRIEND,— . . . It is clearer than ever to me, that if you wish for a common understanding with England, you will find it best secured on a military basis. That Germany has a right to secure her position strategically is granted. It remains to demonstrate, (1) that there is no other means to such security but the annexation of Alsace and a part of Lorraine; (2) that the fortresses, which threatened Germany formerly, will not become a menace to France henceforth.

‘There are in England also some voices in favour of a plébiscite in the parts to be annexed. To me it seems an un-German comedy, which however might be acted in Alsace with good prospect of success, “by desire.”

‘The French refugees are very numerous in England, and they make mischief in all circles of society. Germany is too great to enter upon a paper war. Also with regard to the export of arms, nothing can be done before Parliament meets.’

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

OXFORD, PARKS END, October 25.

‘First of all, many thanks for your valuable letter. I had not expected an answer from you, for I know what you have on your shoulders now, but it was a great satisfaction to me to know that I was not mistaken, and that with regard to England our goal is the same. Much might be said with regard to the paths to this goal, but there is no time for that now. Here the situation of things is a very difficult one. Lord Granville is neither a Clarendon nor a Palmerston, but he has the best intentions, and is amiable to everybody. He has many French friends, and of course the French are everywhere in London now. The Times is very kind at present. It has printed a letter of mine to-day, which I enclose. It is meant for England, of course, or I should have used stronger language. The speech of Du Bois-Raymond is much too strong for English readers, and would only rouse ill feelings.

'You know, perhaps, that a French loan has to-day been launched on the English market. You know, of course, also that a German loan would have great success here. Though it does Prussia much credit that she seeks for no foreign loans, yet in so doing she forgoes much of the sympathy which in England, as everywhere else, is felt for one's debtors. Many of the most eager friends of the French are interested in the French funds—hinc multae lacrymae! . . .

'If I can be of any help, do make use of me. My influence on the Times is, however, nil; they only print what suits them. All I can do is to make what I write palatable.'

The second letter to 'the People of England,' in the Times of October 22, was in answer to M. Arlès Dufour's appeal to the English nation to save Alsace and Lorraine. The three last letters were answers to 'Scrutator's' letters in the Times. It is an open secret now who was the inspirer of 'Scrutator's' letters. 'The hands were the hands of Esau, but the voice was the voice of Jacob;' and before he wrote his last letter Max Müller felt very certain that he 'was called on to withstand in argument one of the most powerful athletes of our time.'

It is impossible now not to see how much of the present ill feeling in Germany against England dates from the year 1870. Without swerving an inch from the position of neutrality rightly observed by the English Government, the justice of the cause for which Germany was fighting, and the reckless wickedness of the French in attacking her, might have been acknowledged by those in power, whereas Mr. Gladstone's preference for the Romance over the Teutonic nations was well known in Germany, and the general apathy, if not antipathy, of the English to the German cause was universally attributed in Germany to his influence.

The third volume of Chips came out in the autumn, a very large edition being printed. A second edition of Max Müller's Sanskrit Grammar also was brought out. Both were well received. One review states that :—

'Every paper in Mr. Max Müller's third volume of Chips from a German Workshop is valuable. Applied to them, the term exhaustive has really a meaning. Mr. Max Müller always draws from a full cask. He does not write, as so many now do, because he is expected to say something, but because he has something to say. The subject does not make him, he makes the subject. His range, too, is something enormous.'

The Globe considered that:—

'A more delightful volume has not been published for a very long time. Bearing marks on almost every page of the profoundest scholarship, it is absolutely free from all taint of that pedantry which is the besetting sin of most German writers.'

Of the Sanskrit Grammar a reviewer says:—

'It has been the aim of Mr. Müller to produce a work which should combine the clearness of Bopp with the accuracy of Colebrooke and the native writers whom that great scholar took as his model. In this his success has been so great that the Sanskrit Grammar for Beginners is by far the best book that can be put into the hands of a student. In a word, it combines Oriental fullness and accuracy with the European method. It says much, both for the progress of Sanskrit in this country, and for the value of Mr. Müller's own labours, that this admirable Grammar has already reached a second edition.'

TO E. A. FREEMAN, ESQ.

November 12.

'I thought it possible that my new volume of Chips might tempt you to a review. I am not going to write any captatio benevolentiae, though I am going to ask a favour. In the two essays "Are there Jews in Cornwall?" and "St. Michael's Mount," I have had to work through a good deal of matter with which no one is so familiar as you, viz. ecclesiastical antiquities. I want very much to know from some competent person whether I am right or wrong. Therefore the favour I ask is this: if you should review my book, would you look at these two essays more particularly, and give me the benefit of your criticism on any points where I may have gone wrong? I meant to have written to you to ask your advice on these essays before they were printed, but I know you are a busy man, and therefore did not wish to take up any of your time. In the essay on "Cornish Antiquities" you will find, I think, that we hold the same opinions on English Ethnology.

'I am quite miserable about Gladstone. England will never have such an opportunity again. Now it is lost, irretrievably lost. With Germany as a friend, the Black Sea question would have been solved amicably, and the German vote in America would have kept the Irish vote in order, so as to prevent mischief about the Alabama. Now the sin is sinned!'

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, November 12, 1870.

'MY DEAR MR. GLADSTONE,—I am surprised to hear that my new volume of Chips from a German Workshop has not yet reached you. I have written to my publisher, but I hope that by this time the volume may be already in your hands. No doubt the military authorities, who maintain that the south-western frontier of Germany is not secure without taking in part of Alsace and Lorraine, ought to be fully persuaded that they do not deceive themselves and render their line of defence less secure than it is at present. I, of course, know nothing of military science, but I have great confidence in the calm judgement of Moltke. It was for that very reason that I thought a Military Conference the only scheme that could lead to practical results, though, as long as cession of territory was excluded on principle, discussion would have been useless. I am afraid that now a conference of military authorities is no longer possible. I have often watched with wonder a pointsman on a crowded railway station, who holds in his hands the fates of thousands, and who by a movement of his hand, hardly perceptible to others, sends one train to the right and the other to the left. . . . I feel as if two trains, both holding dear friends, had just started, though not in the direction in which I hoped they would have gone.'

TO E. A. FREEMAN, ESQ.

November 27, 1870.

'MY DEAR FREEMAN,—. . . I want to know whether I am right in declining Dr. Bannister's arguments. Could a man at that time have held land under a Jew? What is the most likely meaning of le Jeu? not le Juif, surely? I meant Gladstone's Roman and Romance sympathies for France, and his utter inability to appreciate the character of the struggle now going on between Germany and France. He is fully convinced in his heart that every German is a heretic sive Protestant, a barbarian, and a villain. He might make a few charitable exceptions in favour of two or three Germans whom he happens to know, and who have had the benefit of a tub, physical and intellectual, in England. Happily the feeling towards England in really influential quarters in Germany is good. Bismarck's papers have never joined in the anti-English barking of the newspapers. The talk about the exportation of arms is silly. I wish the French had bought their arms in Germany. The sooner there is an end of that kind of international law the better. Let everybody sell what he can, and let everybody capture what he can; everything else is mere deception and hypocrisy. If Gladstone had ever to confess that he was the writer of the article in the Edinburgh, it might make mischief, for even Bismarck is only a man. But what the real statesmen in Germany want is an alliance offensive and defensive with England: there is no better way for securing peace in Europe. France and Russia are the disturbers of the peace; but, with the English fleet and the German army as the police of Europe, no cock would dare to crow at Paris, no bear would growl at St. Petersburg. England might have had the alliance of Germany for the asking, and at that very time the writer in the Edinburgh Review calls the King of Prussia a hypocrite, Bismarck a villain, and the German people half-civilized brutes!

To his mother Max Müller writes:—

Translation.

November 29.

‘I never said I should like to be a Frenchman, but that I should like to see France strong again, for strong neighbours are good for keeping a country up to the mark, and keep it from arrogance.’

Early in December Max Müller paid the first of several pleasant visits to Hawarden Castle. He woke early in the morning to find a white world, and looking through the window saw Mr. Gladstone making his way alone through the snow to early morning church. He willingly braved the elements later in the day to secure a quiet talk with the Prime Minister.

TO HIS WIFE.

HAWARDEN CASTLE, December 10, 1870.

‘I shall not have much time before breakfast, but I just wanted to let you know that here I am, quite safe. A fine large place, full of people. The Bernstorffs are not here; too busy in London. General Burnside was here, dined, and then went off to New York for a week. He is a fine fellow—just like a strong, tall, English general—and he is truly German, and has told Mr. Gladstone some useful truths. Frederick Peel is here and Mr. Haywood, all very pleasant. No talk yet with Mr. Gladstone, except about University matters, but the fight will come, I expect.’

December 11.

‘There is so much snow that everybody had to stay in. However, Mr. G. and I took a walk through the snow and talked it all over, and I told him that any German statesman who gave up Strassburg deserved to be hanged, and he shook himself a little, but I think he begins to see that we Germans are not such ogres as he thought. G. is an old friend of Abeken's, but had lost sight of him.'

TO DR. ABEKEN.

Translation.

OXFORD, PARKS END, December 13, 1870.

'DEAR FRIEND,—Your letter of December 5 arrived here in good time last Friday, just when I was leaving for Hawarden Castle, where Gladstone had invited me. Count Bernstorff was to be there, but could not get away from London. General Burnside was there, a good ally of the German cause. Above all, however, I must tell you that Mr. Gladstone and Mrs. Gladstone keep your name in friendly and grateful memory; both send their kindest regards to you, and Mr. Gladstone expressed repeatedly how sad, though unavoidable, it was in this earthly existence, that the personal intercourse with men whom we had learnt to love and value highly had to be broken off. It was most fortunate that I could communicate to G. the greater part of your letter; it made a great impression on him. As I told you before, Gladstone's sympathies are by no means for Germany, neither is he familiar with the German language or literature, or the German character or ways; also the French refugees have taken great hold upon him. He distrusts Germany, especially Prussia, and certain unceremonious demonstrations have put him into a bad humour. But he would like to be persuaded, that is clear to me, and if once he perceives the justice of the German claims he is sure to be loyal to his perceptions. The Duc de Grammont has mystified him so much, that Gladstone confessed him to be unreliable. Benedetti's letter in the Standard made it easy for me to refute the Duke by means of the Count. If Benedetti keeps his promise of continuing the letters, the only thing remaining of the two cats will be the tails!

'Our conversation dealt chiefly with the provinces to be surrendered. According to G., all our feeling of human dignity is outraged by forcing even one single being to give up his nationality. Of course I could only rejoin that our feelings would be still more outraged by shooting down even one man, and that in order to avoid this alternative, i.e. war, the surrender of certain provinces with their inhabitants has to be taken into consideration. Then followed the question of the real or apparent necessity of the Vosges frontier. I could only reply that this was a question for experts in military and strategic history, and had been discussed continually since 1648, and that friend as well as foe, German as well as Frenchmen, were perfectly at one on this point.

'The question is whether a short representation of this matter, with which every lieutenant of the Prussian Staff is capable of dealing, would be adequate now. At the close I could only add that at the present juncture of affairs, and in the present mood of the German people and army, a statesman who allows himself to be compelled to surrender Strassburg by threats and not by force would be considered guilty of high treason. G. replied that the greatest mistakes of the statesmen of our century lay in giving greater consideration to the physical than to the moral powers, and that the realization of the German wishes would become a misfortune for Germany. Of course I could only reply that Germany had the right and was in duty bound to decide the question, and that she alone would have to bear the consequences and the responsibility. Many interesting conversations followed, but I do not know whether they are of any interest to you. Gladstone, of course, only spoke for himself, and he remarked several times: "This is my opinion. What the Cabinet thinks is quite a different question." He considers the feeling in England not at all unfriendly towards Germany, and I must confess that the German Press seems to me much more hostile than the English. How comes this? In England it is supposed that the German Press says nothing which is not sanctioned by highest authority. This is a general opinion, very difficult to correct. If Germany wishes an understanding with England in the future, both sides must agree to work for it. The opponents of a German-English alliance do not fail to work against it. I told Gladstone clearly that the only sure guarantee for the peace of Europe consisted in combined action between Germany and England, and if the fleet of England and the army of Germany took up again their old fraternal relations no cock in France would crow, no bear in the East would growl. I, of course, remarked in our conversations that he must consider me a franc-tireur, as I had never worn a uniform and never would wear one, and that the happiness of two sister nations, in whose union the happiness of mankind consisted, was my earnest wish. There were several members of Parliament present, and also some other influential people, and I had sometimes to maintain a sharp conflict, but "the losses on our side were not important."

'I threw in occasionally a hint that hostile relations between Germany and England would force the former to found a formidable navy, also that the German vote in America had up to the present neutralized the Irish vote. I stayed at Hawarden till last night, and, though I have accomplished nothing, we have certainly parted friends.

'I heard from the German Embassy that a messenger was leaving next Thursday, and that he might take a letter. This gives me an opportunity of sending you a volume, at the end of which you will find about eighty letters to Bunsen: some of them, I think, might interest you.

‘My wife sends her kindest regards. We wish you a bright Christmas, bright through that which alone can give us true joy, i. e. the consciousness of having done our duty and having attained great things. Should you think that the sincere gratitude of one unknown might be welcome to our great dux and auspex, I ask you, should the opportunity occur, to give expression of my feelings of admiration and gratitude to Count Bismarck; you will do it so much better than I could do it myself.’

Besides several relatives, many of Max Müller’s school and University friends were taking active part in the great war, as the following letter to Fontane, the novelist, shows:—

Translation.

PARKS END, December 20, 1870.

‘MY DEAR FONTANE,—Nothing for a long time has given me greater pleasure than your letter. I had indeed seen in the papers that you had escaped with a whole skin, but I am glad to hear at first hand that you have returned to Berlin well and strong, and that all goes well with you. The feeling here against Germany is bad, and from pure ignorance; in Germany the feeling seems even worse against England, and from the same cause. It makes one wild, and I have hardly any other thought than how one can help to cure this evil. Help as far as you can!’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 20.

‘One gets no rest with this terrible war, and there seems small hope yet of peace. I had a most interesting visit at Gladstone’s from December 9–12. It was a great honour, and it is possible it has done some good. He wrote the whole time, so we had to stay in the house, and many were the discussions. Bismarck is much disliked in England: he does mad things, and who knows what enemies he may make. Well, I have done my best, and heard much that was interesting. Also I get some news from Versailles, but that is between us.’

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

PARKS END, December 21, 1870.

‘MY DEAREST FRIEND,—I feel with you the horrors of this time, and though I am so proud of the heroism of the German nation, I am nevertheless ashamed to think how often the world looked upon the great spiritual victories of the Fatherland with scorn and indifference, and now is on her knees because we have learnt to aim our bullets with accuracy and skill. However, I trust that the wild beast will soon retire, and that the spirit in Germany will attain the upper hand. At all events, Nemesis has arisen with all grandeur, and to have lived to see the fall of Imperialism is a comfort to me. I was somewhat entangled in controversy which was more of an ethical than political nature. My adversary was Gladstone, but we have parted friends. The feeling in England is not good, for many reasons; but it seems to me that the German feeling towards England is still more childish. Till Germany and England recognize that they are sister-nations, there will be no calm in Europe. We all must help to that as far as we can. I have constructed the new volume of my Chips with that thought underlying it. . . . Renan is in Paris, Mohl told me, who is in London. London is crowded with Frenchmen, which creates much sympathy with France, especially in Society. Here in Oxford everything is quiet and calm, and I am decorating the Christmas tree for my four children. My work proceeds slowly, for there is hardly any time for anything but for the reading of newspapers. And what are you doing? Pattison is well, always the same.—Always in old friendship, yours.'

TO PROFESSOR KLAUS GROTH.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 22, 1870.

'Your Quickborn, received to-day, reminds me of my letter-debts, which I would gladly have paid long ago, but one lives in such a tumult, one can neither read nor write, from the quantities to read in the papers. So, first of all, my thanks for this new sign of life and affection. I shall make my way through it, as it is now vacation. I hope you have received the third volume of my Chips, which now and again will remind you of me. I have read your dedication to the Crown Prince with delight, and what you write of Bismarck is cheering and encouraging. Yes, the times are great, but I wish the deluge of blood were over, or the animal in man will become all-powerful, and we shall never come to our senses. However fine and elevating may be the heroic courage of the German nation, killing does not belong to the fine and free arts. God grant an honourable and lasting peace may reward the countless sacrifices made by the nation. For a time I felt alarmed for Kiel and its inhabitants. Your letter, which I translated at once and sent to the Times, was never published. The English like deeds and stories of horror, and their taste is for highly-spiced and peppered articles! I hope you need not report the same of Holstein. I have had to fight a good deal in the English papers. I hope that is now over. I hope you and yours are well, and that the clouds over your happiness are passing away: it grieves me to think that the sunshine is not so bright there as two years ago. But all that belongs to the small evils of life, and one learns, with such terrible evils all round one, to bear the little ones more easily. Shall we meet this year? I hope so, but one dare make no plans. On the whole, it goes well with us; the children are well. I am at times plagued with colds, as lately when Stockhausen was in Oxford, and sang beautifully, and I had to stay in bed! I saw him the next morning: he looked well, and was in splendid voice. To-day some venison and Marzipan arrived here, doubtless from Forsteck. Has your wife received the new edition of Deutsche Liebe? Now farewell, and may our paths meet in 1871.'

In November of this year Max Müller had been elected a Delegate of the University Press. In July, 1882, he was made a Perpetual Delegate. He resigned in 1896, finding that he could no longer spare the time from his private work and ever-increasing correspondence; partly also from a growing feeling of the great responsibility resting on the Delegates in conducting such an important business, a responsibility which he felt he was not strong enough or young enough to face any longer.

TO MATTHEW ARNOLD, ESQ.

OXFORD, December 27, 1870.

'MY DEAR ARNOLD,—I wanted to read your book before writing to thank you for it, and having read it, I can thank you all the more honestly. It requires much courage to write about religious questions, because almost every word you touch is oily and befingered, and it is difficult to handle them without besmutting one's hands. But it is all the more necessary to rescue the old words, to dust them, and rub them clean, and then show them to the world in their original purity and splendour, as you have done. Your justification of St. Paul is most successful, and I expect it will tell more than many learned controversies. You know that the inevitable decay of words forms part of the science of language, and therefore your chapter on the vicissitudes of the Pauline phraseology interests me all the more. It is but a chapter of modern mythology, but a very important one. I send you by book post a copy of some introductory lectures of mine, on the Science of Religion. I have only had sixteen copies struck off, and I send one to you, because if you look at them, you will see at once what my object was in delivering them. It will take several years before I publish what I want to say on the whole subject, but in the meantime I wanted you to know that we are working in the same mine, I on a very low level as yet, you on a high level, but on the whole with the same purpose. There was one expression in your book with which I could not agree. The etymology of words is not a merely fanciful argument; the etymological meaning, if accurately elaborated, is a most important historical element. There was a time when the etymological meaning of a word represented what really was to the early framers of language the most striking feature of an object, or the most important characteristic of a new conception. To put an etymology in the place of a definition, is no doubt foolish, but in the history of thought etymology holds a most important place. Plato's chaff is only directed against those who would use etymology instead of a definition; that there could be a historical element in etymology was beyond Plato's horizon. At the same time I do not defend R.'s etymologies. I send you the new edition of Deutsche Liebe, because the translation of your poem strikes me as really successful. I was glad to hear that you feel more kindly towards Bunsen; Froude wrote to me to tell me the same. Yours very truly.'

CHAPTER XVIII

1871

King of Burma. Correspondence with Abeken and Gladstone. Taine's Lectures. Peace Festival. Letter from Crown Prince. Death of father-in-law. Ems. Interviews with Emperor and Crown Prince. Dr. Stainer. New edition of Lectures on Language.

THE year opened gloomily for France and Germany, and even for many in England, who were watching the great contest with beating hearts. Max Müller found little rest, and the correspondence with Mr. Gladstone and Dr. Abeken at Versailles was actively carried on. January found him preparing a second edition of Volume III of Chips, of which the first edition of 3,000 copies was nearly sold out.

Max Müller received about this time a Burmese letter from the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Mandalay, conveying the thanks of Mindoon Min, the enlightened King of Burma, for his translation of the Dhammapada, and expressing his great pleasure in hearing of the desire of the learned Professors of Europe and America to know more about the doctrines of Buddha, and ending with a promise to print the three 'Beedaghats'<sup>1</sup> in Pāli, and send copies for distribution to the English Commissioner. If this work was ever begun, it was doubtless stopped by the accession to the throne of the savage Thebaw, and the subsequent conquest and annexation of Burma by the English. It was reserved for King Chulalongkorn, the present enlightened King of Siam, to print the whole Tripitaka.

TO SIR CHARLES MURRAY (Minister at Lisbon).

PARKS END, OXFORD, January, 1871.

'MY DEAR SIR,—I should have answered your letter before, but Christmas brings many duties and distractions to a man with a family of young children, who at the same time enjoys the privilege of Christmas dinners in College, and has to perform important duties at College meetings. The Warden, to whom I mentioned your letter, told me he would write to you and send me his letter, but he has not done so. I believe his chief object was to remind you of your portrait for our hall.

<sup>1</sup> Pitakas, the sacred canon of Buddhism.

‘Now with regard to “metaphor”: that seems to me an inexhaustible subject, and one that can be approached from many points. No single writer could treat it with anything like completeness, and every contribution, however special, would be useful. The array of languages which you can either command or call to your assistance is ample for making a successful attack, and I should think that the library of the Academy at Lisbon would give you the opportunity for verifying any statements for which you do not like to trust to your memory. A book on metaphor, even in English alone, could be made not only very instructive, as revealing the secret working of the national mind, but very amusing, particularly if the languages of the people and their slang expressions are taken into account—a stunner, a fizzer, a brick, &c. I have myself treated the subject of metaphor in its most general aspects in the eighth lecture of my second series, and as you may not have that volume by you, I send you a copy, the Foreign Office having kindly relaxed the extreme rigour of their recent rule against sending anything in the Ambassador’s bag. How such a treatise on metaphor should be arranged is more than I could venture to suggest. If it was arranged according to the principal subjects from which metaphors are borrowed, it would become interesting as a study of national character, for “out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.” But any collection carefully made, with reference to authorities, so that it might be used and quoted by subsequent writers, would certainly be well received.

‘If at any time my services can be of any use to you in your literary researches, please to command them at all times in the name of the Mallard <sup>1</sup>.

Yours faithfully,

‘MAX MÜLLER.’

TO DR. ABEKEN.

Translation.

OXFORD, PARKS END, January 3, 1871.

‘DEAR FRIEND,—Many thanks for your last letter. I greatly value your full answers to my letters, when your whole time and strength belongs to the sacred cause of the Fatherland, when your heart, your head, and your hands are sure to find little time and rest. If I could only do more here! The desire to do so is not wanting. I have again had an interesting correspondence with Gladstone. I sent him the pamphlet by Seidewitz (1867), Prussia's Rights with regard to Luxemburg, and as he wrote to me that the last Luxemburg telegrams had made him less hopeful about a better understanding, I communicated to him in English form your opinions with regard to Luxemburg. His answer of December 29 was good. He knew of no answer then to Lord Granville's letter, which had been sent via Berlin, but he admitted that there is no doubt that military urgency might justify, in given circumstances, a Power actually at war in taking into its own hands provisionally the settlement of certain questions, which could only be finally disposed of by a joint authority. The Whigs are very angry at Lord Stanley's famous interpretation of the Luxemburg affair. . . .

<sup>1</sup> The All Souls crest. Sir C. Murray had been a Fellow of the College.

'It seems to me it is necessary to think of the future even more than of the present, and I confess that all my hopes of a great future for Europe are based on the alliance of the two great Teutonic sister-nations on the Continent and in the isles. Everything else seems artificial and only temporary; this alone is organic and lasting. But it is indeed a hard task. In England the war has now become a party question: the Tories will make it a reason for their attack on the Government. That is good on the whole; it will lead to a combination of Tories and Radicals, and so the great Liberal party—the support of the Government—will be forced to take up a firm position with regard to foreign policy. Even a change of Government, though not probable at present, would not do any harm, for it would concentrate English power and English opinion. It would be wiser if Germany did not underestimate England's military and naval power, and thus weaken the desire for an English alliance. England's fleet is stronger than ever, her people are strong and patriotic, her credit is the best in the world. (That makes me think the German loan in England ought to have been introduced differently—a better god-mother, and a fatter or finer child!)

'My wife sends kindest regards. She is German through and through, and she and my three girls, the youngest only six years old, work indefatigably for the wounded. Henry Acland is doubtful about the German cause, but he was much pleased with your thought about him, and he reciprocates your kind messages.

'I consider Count Bismarck's message to me the greatest reward for the little I have been able to do.'

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

PARKS END, January 5, 1871.

'I should have answered your last letter before this, if I had not waited to send you a copy of the Letters on the War, which arrived to-day at last, and was sent off at once. You will see in them the character of the controversy between me and Gladstone, even without having the letters written by "Scrutator" at hand. I am quite convinced that Gladstone's accomplice has muddled a good deal, for Gladstone, in spite of all his weaknesses, is after all a very fine fellow. One does not become Prime Minister of England without having a very strong back. His sympathies, alas! are altogether Norman, not Saxon, but his feeling for what is right is stronger than all his other feelings. It is not true to say that he could have prevented the war, for, in spite of his great majority, he would have become impossible for his office, had he threatened France, or tried to interfere in the struggle between France and Germany. Now matters stand very differently in England. The war has become a party question: the Tories, with the extreme Liberals, will attack the Ministry on the basis of foreign policy. This will force the powerful Liberal party to a decided and recognized policy, and that is best for us. The German feeling towards England is incomprehensible to me, and the Government does not in the least encourage it. The war-power of England is greater than it has ever been—the fleet is ready to strike, the whole nation is patriotic, and the wealth is colossal. It is worth while to have such an ally, and Germany, conscious of her own greatness, ought to speak as peer to peer, not as a hysterical housewife to a housemaid. Well, we will hope for the best.

'Just think, I have received the warmest thanks from Bismarck from Versailles!'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

January 7, 1871.

'I have sent you a little book with my letters on the war. I lately received from Versailles, through Abeken, most grateful thanks from Bismarck. I will copy the letter for you: "First, my thanks for what you have done and are doing for Germany, for our holy cause! This expression of gratitude is not from me alone. I write in the name of Count Bismarck, who spoke to me only yesterday with a full and thankful recognition of your great and influential activity during this time, which he has heard of through the newspapers. He is rejoiced to have such an ally." What can one desire more?'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

January 15, 1871.

'The news of John's<sup>1</sup> death was a great shock: what misery for his poor mother. . . . The whole land must be full of mourning—even here one cannot enjoy life, when one reads every day of these battles, and one sees no hope of peace. Here in England sympathies are much divided; pity is naturally on the side of France, and Bismarck's policy has alienated many people in England. But, on the whole, all goes well. The screams in the papers signify little: much of it comes from French refugees, who swarm in London. The better classes are inclined to Germany, but not to Bismarck! I am not an admirer of his, highly as I prize the work he has done for Germany, and truly as I recognize that the whole aim of his life has been the welfare of his Fatherland. Such work cannot always be carried out with perfectly clean hands. On the other hand, I cannot agree with the German abuse of the French nation. The French as a nation fight bravely, and show that they are by no means so depraved and perishing as the writers in the German papers think. At all events I hate such hectoring, as if the Germans were the general guardians of morality, and privileged possessors of all virtues. If this war goes on long, all Europe will be a desert, and one must be ashamed of mankind. The wild beasts behave better.'

<sup>1</sup> His cousin, John von Basedow, shot by franc-tireurs.

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

January 29.

'... As long as one reads the pages of Comte de Gasparin's pamphlet, one seems to live in a pure and bracing atmosphere, one begins to breathe freely, one's heart expands, everything around seems bright and full of hope. But we cannot live on mountain-tops, we must live and work in the low cloudy valleys, and when one is brought again face to face with real life and real men, the heart fails and all hopes vanish. I knew there were such men in France as the writer of this pamphlet. There is the true and noble ring of the old French mettle in all his words and all his thoughts. If a country can still produce such men, it need not despair about its fate. I feel quite ashamed when I see German writers speak of the whole of France as one vast Babylon, implying at the same time that Heaven has granted to us the exclusive privilege of all virtue and godliness. The only pity is that in France the good men withdraw from the front of political life; Gambetta rules, while Gasparin retires to Switzerland.

'Count Gasparin's scheme seems to me quite perfect. It gives in reality far more to Germany than she will get by annexing Alsace and Lorraine. It would be a blessing to Germany, to France, to Europe.

'But can it be? First of all, there is a large and at present very powerful party in Germany, which is no longer accessible to any arguments. We must take men as they are, and we must take nations as they are; and a nation flushed with victory and crushed by grief is not like a nation in its right mind. It is with nations as with individuals. How often do we see a friend rushing into misery, whom we might save if we could hold him by the arm, or make him listen to reason. That fight against the irrational and unconquerable powers of life is the most distressing; yet I do not say that reason should not fight against unreason: I only fear that in this case the fight is hopeless from the beginning.

‘Suppose Germany and France placed their fate in the hands of Count Gasparin, what could he do? Could he persuade the Great Powers to guarantee the neutrality of Alsace? Such a guarantee implies a readiness to go to war for the sake of others. If it does not mean that, it means nothing. Does that readiness exist in England? Is there any party in England strong enough to carry such a measure, and to commit the country to such contingencies? Depend upon it, Germany would demand very stringent guarantees, for Lord Stanley’s words after the conclusion of the treaty for the neutrality of Luxemburg have been a terrible lesson. I should consider England capable of the most generous and heroic efforts, but from what I see of the temper of the people, and the strange attraction between the most opposite political centres, I have grave doubts as to the possibility of such a guarantee receiving the approval of Parliament.

‘Then comes the question about Russia, and whatever the personal character of the present Czar may be, no Russian statesman would help to heal that sore to which he trusts as the best security for the success of the Russian policy of the future.

‘Count Gasparin’s pamphlet has no doubt been sent to Count Bismarck. If not, I should gladly send it through Dr. Abeken. It is a masterpiece in every sense.

‘If Alsace is too small by itself, why not make it a Canton of Switzerland? It would thus join an established political system, and enjoy the traditional prestige of Swiss neutrality. But I have no hope.’

The growth of feeling in England against Germany and for France, was often a sore trial to Max Müller, but he was refreshed from time to time by sympathetic letters from many English friends, and especially from Mr. Goldwin Smith, at that time living at Ithaca in the United States, who took a wide, unprejudiced, historical view of the whole question. He was always for the annexation of Alsace and Lorraine, ‘provided a good natural frontier could be formed,’ and considered the bombardment of Paris ‘a disagreeable necessity’; whilst he asked, in a letter to Max Müller, ‘what demon had entered into his countrymen, that when they are delivered by a wonderful display of German heroism, and at vast expense of German blood, from the peril which has always been hanging over them, . . . they, instead of blessing, curse their deliverers?'

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, February 2.

'Before thanking you for your letter, I wrote to Mr. Delane to ask him whether he would allow me to write a review of Count Gasparin's pamphlet, and thus bring his ideas before the English public. I have his reply to-day, and he simply declines. He evidently considers the matter as settled. I have sent the pamphlet to Dr. Abeken. Unfortunately there were some remarks in it which are sure to offend Count Bismarck, particularly where he tells him that by his decision about Alsace he has to prove whether he possesses mere habileté or political genius. However, the real difficulty is that even Count Bismarck is not strong enough, supposing he was influenced by the future rather than by the present, to oppose the military party, and I believe the feeling in Germany is so strong that for any statesman now to give up Strassburg would be simply to abdicate. There is a poetry about Strassburg which is stronger than all prose. Nations have their rough-hewn destinies to fulfil; at present I see no help. I just see the morning papers: I do not believe in the conditions of peace; it would be a challenge to Nemesis, and people in Germany have not read history to no purpose. But it is hard to mediate between intoxication and madness.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

February 7.

'The feeling in England is less excited. They must yield to the inevitable. So I have not packed up, but have had to let people know I could live in Germany as well as, if not better than, here! I have not anything to complain of, and continue to have most interesting letters from Gladstone, the Prime Minister. He is a very clever and honourable man, and would willingly do his best, but he has a difficult position.'

The following letter is given by permission, as showing the feeling of an unbiassed historian on the recent events:—

SOMERLEAZE, WELLS, SOMERSET,

February 19, 1871.

'MY DEAR MÜLLER,—I have got a wild scheme in my head, in which you may possibly be able to help me. It seems pretty certain that the German troops are to march into Paris. Now that is a thing which does not happen much above once in a thousand years, and a thing for which I have been earnestly longing ever since 976. For the first time in my life, I wish to see a military spectacle. I have said ever since 1851, that, if L. N. Buonaparte was to be guillotined, and they would only send me word, I would come and see the show, in whatever part of the world I might be. And this show will be quite as satisfactory as the other. But is it possible? Is it safe? I do not doubt that you have means of finding out; you doubtless know some of the swells at Versailles or somewhere. If you could give me a lift, I should be deeply obliged. If I could get to see the Emperor's triumph without jeopardizing mine own self, I should greatly enjoy it, and I might make something of it for the public advantage. If I did go, I should like to get Bryce, Pindar, or somebody to come with me.

'I hope you have by this time seen both my Pall Mall letters. To my utter amazement, the Times has gone and reprinted the second of them. That paper has hitherto made it a fixed rule never to mention me or any writing of mine, or to let my name appear, except at the Mid-Somerset election, when they could not well help it. What does this mean?

'I am sending for the Academy, as I see you have been writing in it. Do you altogether forbid me to say "Kikero"?

'Yours very truly,

EDWARD A. FREEMAN.'

TO DR. ABEKEN.

Translation.

PARKS END, February 20, 1871.

'DEAR FRIEND,—I enclose the letter of a friend of Germany, Mr. Freeman. I do not know if his name is familiar to you. He is one of the best historians and public men in England—a man like Treitschke, indefatigable with his pen, and always to the point and incisive. He has been faithful to our cause to the end, from solid true conviction. His letter will show you his desire, and I thought it worth while to send it just as it is. You know the English too well to think that a man like Mr. Freeman would keep anything in the background. He is one who has belonged to us from a deep conviction; he keeps himself, however, quite independent, and the only thing it is possible to do for him is a kindness like the one he asks for. We need all the help in England which we can procure by honest means. I often ponder now over the change of affairs at the death of Peter III, and I still hope that we may win the battle of Burkersdorf, though it be only on the diplomatic battle-field, but may we win it before it is too late. Do not underestimate England:

she has only twenty million inhabitants—but they are Englishmen, and they come from Schleswig-Holstein.’

The answer to Mr. Freeman’s request was as follows:—

March 10, 1871.

‘MY DEAR FREEMAN,—I had a letter from my friend at Versailles: he says it was impossible to write, for nothing was settled from hour to hour about the entry, in fact there has been no entrée triomphale. It is curious that, in spite of all provocation, my friend—and he reflects Bismarck, I believe, most faithfully—clings to the idea of a friendship between England and Germany as the only safety for the future. Have you seen “Scrutator’s” book? I have not, but I heard from a friend this morning that it is simply libellous, and that legal action should be taken. If so, I am certain that Gladstone had nothing to do with it, but that it is ———, pur et simple.’

The following letter shows that, amidst all the excitement of the times, Max Müller did not allow his work to flag:—

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, February 21, 1871.

‘You will think me very unreasonable, I am afraid, if just now I trouble you with a question about Homeric Mythology and Religion. I should not venture to do so, did I not think that you or your son could answer my inquiry by a simple Yes or No. The fact is, I am preparing a new edition of my Lectures on the Science of Language, and as they are to be stereotyped, I have to revise them carefully once more. When I came to the passage in my Second Series where I had tried in a few lines to explain your view of the origin of Greek Mythology, I did not know what to do. From reading your book I certainly thought that you admitted an early stratum of Jewish thought, on which, by metamorphic and other processes, the religion and mythology of Homer were built up. In a letter which you did me the honour to address to me, you proposed a different theory, or at least you gave me a new insight into your views on the subject. You seem to admit there an independent origin for the religious and mythological opinions of the Greeks and the Jews, and to be satisfied with the admission of a later contact between Aryan and Semitic ideas. Under these circumstances I thought the best plan would be, if you allowed me, to print in a note some extracts from your letter, and I therefore send you the original, that you may look at it once more, and tell me whether you object to my proposal. In either case, whether you say Yes or No, I must request you to return me the letter, for I hope my children will hereafter value it as much as myself.

‘PS.—I sent Count Gasparin’s pamphlet to Dr. Abeken, but I have not heard from him lately. I am almost afraid my last letters, which I sent through the English Post Office, and not as before through the Prussian courier, may not have reached him. I feel as strongly as ever that Count Gasparin’s proposal is the right one, but I cannot believe that at present it is possible. Though I am an extreme Radical in University politics, I was glad that Professor Fawcett’s amendment was rejected; it would have weakened our position in the conflict which is coming. But I feel convinced that the sooner the last trace of protection is removed from the study of Theology at Oxford the better. At All Souls our Fellowship Examination is entirely in Modern History and Law, and no clergyman ought to have any chance of being elected; yet out of fifteen fellows elected under the new Statute, four are clerical. They won in a fair and open field.

‘M. M.’

FROM DR. ABEKEN.

Translation.

February 21, 1871.

‘It is a decisive week on which we have entered. The armistice ends with the end of the week, unless there is a guarantee for peace. It would be a terrible misfortune if war had to begin again; the indignation of our army would be greater than ever. At this moment Thiers is sitting with Prince Bismarck for their first exchange of views in the same salon in which, at the beginning of November, he was discussing an armistice. He might then have had just the same conditions as now, and what must he feel when he thinks what his country might have been spared, had he or his colleagues then listened to reason! We too should have been spared much, if falsehood and vanity had then been less powerful in France. People tell us to be moderate; they forget what moderation is required if, after our new efforts and sacrifices, we make no harder conditions than we made in November. You say, “Make peace with France and make peace with England.” No one can long for it more truly than we. Every alliance is repulsive to us except friendship with England. But the tone of the debates in Parliament, nay, even the tone of the Queen’s Speech, which tries to deal equal measure to both sides, and for that very reason deals unequal measure, cannot advance peace and friendship. What might England have done, what misery might England have prevented, if, at the beginning of the war, it had possessed the moral courage to call Good good, Wrong wrong, Right right, Crime criminal! It has turned out well for us that England did not act, now that the world has witnessed this new act in the solemn drama of history. The French sentiments of the people of Alsace and Lorraine prove to me all the more strongly that we are in duty bound to bring back this German race to the German Empire. We have to cure them of a fearful disease, that future generations, though blushing at the disgrace of their forefathers, may grow up to a healthy life. It is inconceivable how, while German language and German morals remained unchanged, the love for the old German Fatherland has become almost extinct. Think of the Protestants of Alsace, of the Evangelical clergy of Alsace! How can they be so blind as not to see that the fate of the Evangelical Church in Alsace depends on their union with Germany, while union with France implies its certain extinction? The Roman Catholics in Germany are not so blind; and their leaders, whose home is not in Germany, but at Rome, do all they can to prevent the union of Alsace with Protestant Germany.'

TO DR. ABEKEN.

Translation.

PARKS END, February 24, 1871.

'DEAR FRIEND,—I received your letter this morning, and I am indeed glad to hear that the Crown Prince remembers me so kindly. I wrote to him at once, and enclose the letter, asking you to look through it and hand it to the Crown Prince with a copy of the Letters on the War. I send the book by post, just as it is; there was no time to have it bound. I have also written to Gladstone, after having received your letter: alas! the Protestant argument has no effect on him. Lord Shaftesbury is the man for that; he has already done something in the matter, but his views are very narrow. Public opinion is getting more moderate in England. The only thing now is to wait—perhaps our enemies may do good service to us.

'I sent you a pamphlet of Count Gasparin. Gladstone is delighted with it, as you may have heard; the spirit of it is good. I could not help telling Gladstone that Russia would never think of helping to heal the wound: many plans for the future are built on the reopening of this wound.

'With regard to Freeman, do what you can; . . . he has a powerful, indefatigable pen, and is German through and through. Could you not persuade old Carlyle to write or to say something very amiable?'

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, February 27, 1871.

'MY DEAR MR. GLADSTONE,—I received your letter this morning, and I look forward with great interest to the short Memorandum to which you refer. I believe there is no scholar occupied with the study of the growth and spreading of religious ideas, who has not had to modify some of his own opinions on the subject during the last ten years. The evidence has become so much larger and richer and deeper, that we are forced, whether we like it or not, to assume a new standpoint in order to command the whole field that is open before us. I sent you the extract from Abeken's letter as it stood, but I marked it private, private as it were, even to you, intended for the dispassionate spectator of the grand drama of history, not for the Prime Minister of England. Otherwise I could not have left what Abeken said about Moral Courage without incurring the charge of impertinence. I have told him what I think on the subject, and that it is easy to be wise post factum. With the same intention, I sent you his frank confession about the state of feeling in Alsace and Lorraine. I admit it was a surprise to me, and I could quote statements from recent travellers in those provinces that would lead to different conclusions. But before all things it is right that the truth should be known, and I wanted you in particular to know it. Lord Granville possesses, no doubt, information on the subject of public feeling in Alsace and Lorraine from independent sources, and he would not quote Abeken against Abeken, in discussing the dangers which this Peace may bring on Europe. The difficulties are doubtless very great, yet blood, language, and religion are three powerful allies in the struggle which will now begin. Yours sincerely.'

TO THE SAME.

February 28.

'DEAR MR. GLADSTONE,—Accept my best thanks for the Memorandum, of which you sent me a copy. I should be very happy to discuss some points with you in more peaceful times; this Peace is no peace. Yet do not judge the statesmen of Germany too harshly. After the sad experience which they have had of the French, they cannot bring themselves to believe that a people who could not forgive Sadowa, would ever forget Sedan. It is their duty to think, first of all, of the safety of the country committed to their care. They are convinced that war will begin again whatever they do, or at all events they think that the only chance of peace is the hopelessness of a new attack on the part of France.

'As you told me in your letter that a new Bill on Clerical Fellowships would soon be presented to Parliament, I have taken the liberty to send you a few remarks on the subject of Fellowships in general. I have watched their working now for more than twenty-two years, being in fact one of the oldest residents at Oxford, and I confess I should like to see these magnificent resources of the University more usefully applied than they are at present. My remarks on Fellowships in general I should be quite prepared to send to the Times, if you thought it could be of any use.'

TO M. RENAN.

OXFORD, March 7, 1871.

'I was so pleased to hear that you and Madame Renan had not suffered during the last months, and that you are well enough to resume your work. Let us forget, or let us at least be silent on the past; it has been too horrible. I know you are as strongly French as I am German, but that does not prevent both of us, I think, from feeling deeply the shame and degradation which that war has brought on the race to which we belong as men. We feel ashamed if we are told that our ancestors, our most distant ancestors, were simious; is there one race of animals so savage, so brutal, as man can be? nor does there seem to be any hope of progress or improvement with regard to our ideas respecting war. We all share the guilt of it, we are all ready to take part in it, and we are actually proud of our efficiency in manslaughter. I know of one redeeming feature only in war: it shows that there are some things for which men are ready to die; that there is in man the gift of martyrdom, which I suppose the brutes do not possess; but, apart from that, we must all hide our faces in shame and grief. No doubt the best you and Madame Renan can do, is to go away for a time so as to have complete change. In a few weeks more England will be lovely in the warmth and colours of spring. We shall certainly be at Oxford till June, and my wife asks me to tell you and Madame Renan that she hopes you will come and stay with us at Oxford. There are two rooms at your disposal, you would find plenty of work at the Bodleian Library, and nothing could give her and me greater pleasure than to have you quietly staying here as long as you are able. If you would only let us know a few days before when we may expect you, you will find everything ready for you. I had a letter from M. Taine to-day; I hope the University will invite him to give us a course of lectures. I did not venture to propose you, for, though we are advancing, we advance slowly. He would lecture in French on some period of French Literature. It is not settled yet, but I hope it will succeed.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

March 10.

'One begins to live quietly again, now that peace is made: it was a fearful time, and one keeps thinking, who knows when it may begin again? The joy in Germany must be immense. The Crown Prince sent me word I ought, as an old friend, to have sent him a copy of my Letters on the War. I have done so now, and I wrote a beautiful letter too!'

On March 31 Max Müller delivered an evening lecture at the Royal Institution on Mythology, which was, as usual, largely attended. It was some years before this that his friend Lord Strangford wrote: 'Here (in England) there is no school of Philology, and I do not quite hold Max Müller guiltless for not having founded one, instead of going off into Comparative Mythology.'

As the Professorship of Modern European Languages had been abolished when Max Müller accepted the new Chair of Comparative Philology, it was resolved from time to time to invite celebrated foreigners to lecture on some foreign language or literature, and this year the Curators were anxious to secure the services of M. Taine. The following letter gives an account of the scheme, with some hints on lecturing:—

TO M. TAINE.

OXFORD, March 17, 1871.

'I hasten to answer your kind letter as far as I can. First, as to the time. The fact is that our Summer Term is over the first week of June, and very little work is done during the last week. Therefore if you could begin before Whit-Sunday, you would probably have a better audience. Your course of lectures is the first beginning of a new experiment, and everything will depend on your success. Oxford is an extremely difficult place to lecture in, because all audiences are very mixed. You have young students, you have fellows and tutors, you have Professors, and for your lectures ladies also, I think. It is difficult to hit where there are so many targets. I do not expect that you will have many young students, and you may therefore aim a little higher. I should lecture as if I were addressing a highly educated lady, not taking much for granted, making everything clear by a full statement of facts, but then drawing out the very best lessons that the facts will yield. For that purpose your philosophers and moralists would be more useful, perhaps, than your dramatists, but I dare say you are right in selecting the latter. My only fear is that the classical dramatic writers are a little too well known, and that they may not prove sufficiently attractive. A picture of the thoughts and manners of the times in which they lived would remedy that defect, and you would know better than anybody else how to place before us the political and intellectual stage on which Racine and Molière were themselves the actors. Lastly, as to the language: it has been decided, not without some opposition, that the lectures should be given in French. But, of course, many of your hearers would have difficulty in following, and therefore a slow and very distinct delivery would be a matter of great consequence. The lectures are open to every member of the University, and the invitation to lecture comes to you from the Vice-Chancellor, in the name of the University. The lectures are delivered at the Taylor Institution, because the funds for paying the Lecturer come out of Sir Robert Taylor's bequest. It is not an easy task which you are undertaking, but I feel very sanguine as to its success. If you want any further information I shall be most happy to give it.'

M. Taine accepted the invitation, and arrived in Oxford soon after the above letter was written.

Though M. Taine was not actually the guest of the Max Müllers, residing in their house, he was constantly with them, and, after he had received the degree of Honorary D.C.L., they gave a very large party, at which they gathered together all the leading spirits in Oxford to meet the distinguished foreigner, who charmed everybody by his easy and agreeable conversation. The next morning the appalling news of some of the worst deeds of the Commune was in the papers, and the brilliant Frenchman was an altered being; he was wounded to the heart by the savage acts of his countrymen, and seemed as if unable to look any one in the face. Happily his lectures were already finished, and he left immediately, deeply commiserated by Max Müller, to whom he acknowledged that it was far worse than the humiliation inflicted by the war with Germany.

TO REV. G. COX.

'I looked at Gladstone's book Homeric Synchronism—it is very disappointing. So great a man, so imperfect a scholar! He has no idea how shaky the ground is on which he takes his stand. The reading of those ethnic names in the hieroglyphic inscriptions varies with every year and with every scholar. I do not blame them: their studies are and must be tentative, and they are working in the right direction. But the use which Gladstone makes of their labours is to me really painful, all the more so because it is cleverly done, and I believe bona fide.'

During the month of April Max Müller accepted the invitation of the committee who were arranging the German Peace Festival in London, to deliver the address on that occasion. The Festival took place on May 1, and was a brilliant success. The music, the artistic tableaux vivants, the expression of deep gratitude, of exultant patriotism, tempered by the thought of all that the victory had cost the Fatherland, can never be forgotten by any of those present. Max Müller's speech throughout struck the right note, and he could feel from the first how he carried his audience with him. The translation, which is given in the Appendix, had the benefit of being corrected by him.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, May 3.

‘My speech will be printed, and I will send you a copy. It has been much discussed in the English papers. It was not an easy task. The audience was a very mixed one. The Ambassador was there, and the republicans, &c. Yes, it went off very well, and I am glad I undertook it. The next day Lord Granville, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, asked me to dinner. To-day I received a most kind letter from the Crown Prince, written by himself. . . . It was very good of him, for doubtless he has many letters to write.’

By gracious permission of His Majesty the German Emperor the letter from the Crown Prince is inserted here:—

BERLIN, 1. Mai 1871.

‘Ich habe mit aufrichtigem Danke und ganz besonderem Interesse Ihre Letters on the War entgegengenommen, welche Sie die Freundlichkeit hatten, mir zu übersenden.

‘Mit der einmütigen Hingebung unseres Volkes während der grossen Zeit, die wir durchkämpft, steht in schönem Einklang die patriotische Haltung, welche unsere deutschen Brüder, oft unter den schwierigsten Verhältnissen und mit Opfern aller Art, bewährt, und durch die sie sich für immer einen Anspruch auf die Dankbarkeit des Vaterlandes erworben haben.

‘Dass die Erfahrungen, welche die Deutschen in England während unseres ruhmvollen Krieges gemacht, nicht immer erfreulich waren, ist mir freilich bekannt. Gründe der verschiedensten Art kommen zusammen, um eine Verstimmung zu erzeugen, die hüben und drüben von alien einsichtigen und patriotischen Männern gleich schmerzlich empfunden ist.

‘Meine feste und zuversichtliche Hoffnung bleibt es aber, dass dieselbe bald jenem herzlichen Einvernehmen wieder Platz machen wird, welches die Natur unserer gegenseitigen Beziehungen und Interessen verlangt. Dieses Ziel wollen wir verfolgen, unbeirrt durch Aufregungen und Eindrücke des Augenblicks, überzeugt, dass es für das Gedeihen beider Länder ebenso heilsam wie für den Frieden Europas unerlässlich ist.

‘Sie haben Ihrerseits niemals aufgehört, in diesem Geiste thätig zu sein, und es ist mir deshalb Bedürfniss, Ihnen meine dankbare Anerkennung für Ihr erfolgreiches Wirken hierdurch auszusprechen.

‘Ihr wohlgeneigter                      FRIEDRICH WILHELM, Kronprinz.’

Translation.

BERLIN, May 1, 1871.

‘I have received with much interest and sincere thanks your Letters on the War, which you so kindly sent to me. The courageous devotion of our people during all the great time of the war is in beautiful harmony with the patriotic feeling which our German brethren everywhere have shown, often under the most difficult circumstances, and which they have proved by sacrifices of all kinds, thus securing for themselves for ever the gratitude of the Fatherland. I know also, only too well, that the experiences of the Germans in England during our glorious war were not always happy ones. Reasons of all kinds combined to produce a discord which makes itself felt as painfully here as in England, by all really discerning and patriotic men.

‘My firm and confident hope, however, remains, that this discord will soon give way again to the hearty understanding which is the natural expression of our mutual relations and interests. Let us struggle towards this goal, unhindered by the excitements and impressions of the moment, convinced that this common understanding is as necessary for the development of both countries, as it is indispensable for the peace of Europe.

‘You, for your part, have never ceased to act in this spirit, and I therefore feel impelled to give expression to my grateful recognition of your successful efforts.

Your well-wisher,

‘FREDERICK WILLIAM, Crown Prince.’

The end of May, Max writes to his mother: ‘The scenes in Paris are awful, and one thinks what these furies would have done in Germany if they had got there.’

During the latter part of the war Max Müller had carried on an interesting correspondence with the venerable diplomatist Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, whose sympathies were entirely German. It has not been possible to recover Max Müller’s letters. Lord Stratford sent him a poem at the close of the war in praise of Germany, which was published in Germany in a collection of poems on the war, and had a large circulation.

Only a month after the Peace Festival Max Müller lost his father-in-law, after a very short illness. As he had already settled to visit Ems again this summer for the waters, he resolved to start as soon as he could, and take his wife for a change, and his little boy with him. They joined his mother at Chemnitz, from which place he wrote to Dr. Abeken, telling him of his plans, and adding, 'From year to year we seem to visit the dead more than the living, and the old happy, beautiful times of meeting do not return.' Shortly before leaving England Max Müller had received a visit from a German, consulting him on the advisability of starting a general subscription among Germans living out of Germany for a monument in commemoration of the war. Max explains his views in the following letter. We know how thoroughly they were realized by the great Germania on the banks of the Rhine.

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

OXFORD, June 12.

'I write by return; Mr. Lang called with a verbal recommendation from Count Bernstorff. I liked the idea, but I told him at once that the impulse must come from Germany. He told me a little while ago that all went well in Germany: a million has been promised in Mayence alone. His plan has the fullest approval from the highest classes. I have not written to him, but to Dr. Heine, who sent me a description of the monument in question; I wrote some encouraging words to him. Let the man work!

'A monument only in Berlin is one-sided. I should like to see a German monument on the banks of the German river, protected by a German fortress; and he who does not understand the "German Michael<sup>1</sup>" can hold to the archangel instead. So you see, I think: Let it grow—should it prove to have no substantial foundation it will fade of itself.'

During the stay at Ems the Emperor came there to drink the waters, and Max Müller had the honour of dining with his Imperial Majesty, whom he had last seen in 1849 at Bunsen's house in London, a refugee from the revolution in Berlin. The Emperor was most gracious and cordial, and thanked Max for his letters to the Times. But it was the meeting again with the Crown Prince—‘Unser Fritz,’ as the troops called him—which gave him the most unfeigned pleasure, and he has described in Auld Lang Syne the affectionate welcome accorded him on the occasion, to the surprise of the great officers and officials present. Abeken, too, was at Ems, and the friends met for the last time. The troops were returning from France, and many a regiment turned up the Lahn valley to greet their Emperor and Prince. On these occasions the town supplied refreshments, whilst the visitors subscribed for cigars and waited on the returning heroes.

<sup>1</sup> Nickname for the German soldier.

Max Müller and his wife were among the few admitted to the railway station to see the Crown Prince off for Munich, where he was to hold a great review of the South German troops. The following note to Dr. Abeken alludes to the dinner with the Emperor:—

Translation.

‘Before I leave Ems I must thank you most heartily once more. I know it is not easy to jump over the magic ring which encircles crowned heads everywhere, but with your support it all went capitally. It will always be for me a “historical moment.” I wish the Emperor could read my speech at the London Peace Festival, so that he should know how highly I value the honour which he has bestowed upon me.’

CONTEMPORARY LETTER.

‘MONACO,’ EMS, July 20, 1871.

‘I know you will be interested in hearing that Max dined with the Emperor on Monday, at 4.30. Max and the poet Von Redwitz were the only civilians present, and Max the only man without any decoration or order! They were a party of eighteen. The Emperor began by saying to Max: “I know of your great fame as an Oriental scholar: what made you take to that line of study?” Max told him he first heard of Sanskrit as a boy from the Duchess of Dessau, the Emperor’s cousin; and they talked about her, and then of his life in England. Everything was so simple, and yet, as they sat at table, Max said, as he listened to the kindly, simple words of the Kaiser, he felt, “Here is a man who hereafter will hold a place second only in German history to Charlemagne.” After dinner the Emperor talked to him again, about Bunsen. Max called him “a true German Ambassador.” “But not very practical,” rejoined the Kaiser. “No,” said Max, "but prophetic." "Yes," said the Kaiser, in the most hearty way, "if he had lived, how he would have rejoiced now, how happy he would have been!" Tuesday evening came the Crown Prince. We saw him arrive, looking hardly older than eight years ago; but his countenance, always so good, had gained depth and experience, and he was, indeed, as our friends the Bradleys said, "a noble fellow, the very type of a hero." He sent for Max early yesterday, and he had an hour's intensely interesting talk with him. When Max got there he was told to wait, as some one was with the Prince, but he had hardly sat down in the ante-room, when the door was thrown open, and in came the Prince, both hands stretched out: "But, Maximilianus, why do you wait here? I have no secrets that you cannot hear! Now sit down, put down your hat. We asked for you everywhere in England and could not see you; and now I find you here in Ems, and I may take your greetings to my wife, may I not?" Then they plunged into the war, and the Prince openly said how he had hated it; and when Max said something about all he had done, he said: "Oh, no compliments, please; I only did my duty." Then he discussed the union of North and South Germany, and how to unite Catholics and Protestants; and said he feared they were not ready yet for a new Reformation in Bavaria: "It wants more than a mere dogma to effect that, it must spring from the hearts of the people," and he added with deep feeling, "and have we Protestants of the North so much to offer them: have we advanced in religion the last 300 years?" He talked of his very hearty reception everywhere in England, and spoke of various people there with an insight into their characters and opinions that was remarkable. "We dined at Gladstone's, and" (with a knowing laugh) "we talked a great deal about Art and Literature." He then told Max how deeply grateful he felt for the efforts he had made to keep up a union in feeling between Germany and England, and added: "You must forgive my not thanking you directly for your letters on the war; and when I did write, I had not time to say half I wished, I have so much to do." He ended by hoping Max would return home in time for both him and the Princess to see him, and added: "It is twenty years since we first met." He left at three o'clock yesterday afternoon. We went to see him off, and he sent for us, coming almost to the door of his room to meet me, and he shook hands in the most hearty way, and as I rose from my curtsy, he said, looking at Boy, "But what then is that?" Max said he was the youngest German sailor, and the Prince shook hands with the small thing; and then talked to me of our visit to Potsdam, and of Oxford, and told me he had my photograph. He talked to us two till the train was ready, when he again shook hands with us both, and went off. I heard Max, as he left, say in German: "Splendid, noble fellow"; and so he is, indeed. He is far handsomer as a man of forty, and, as I said before, there is an earnestness, depth, and grandeur in his face, whilst it has lost none of its bright, genial expression. He is one's ideal of a really noble man. The night he arrived here, one of the hills was illuminated in his honour. It was a most fairy-like scene. At a rocket signal every point in the high hill burst out in bright sheets of Bengal fire, red, white, and green, so that every bush and twig were visible from the base to the summit, and the figures of the men feeding the lights looked like busy gnomes who had created the magical scene.'

Whilst at Ems Max Müller received a note from Dr., afterwards Sir John, Stainer, and later Professor of Music at Oxford, wishing to dedicate his work on Harmony to him. The following letters are interesting as showing Max Müller's continued love of music, though he had almost ceased to perform himself, and only took up his playing again later to accompany his children in their singing:—

TO DR. STAINER.

EMS, July 2.

'I hardly know what to say, and whether I ought to accept the dedication of your work on Harmony. I always feel like a traitor among my musical friends, and quite unworthy of any honourable mention. However, if you think otherwise, I can only say that I shall consider it a great, though most undeserved, honour to have my name connected with your work, and thus to keep a place in the musical annals of Oxford. Some of my happiest recollections date from the years which I spent in the musical atmosphere of Leipzig, when Mendelssohn was there in the full vigour and enjoyment of his genius, and these recollections have often been revived at Oxford when listening to your masterly playing in Magdalen Chapel.'

The dedication is as follows:—

TO PROFESSOR MAX MÜLLER
WHO, THOUGH UNABLE TO DEVOTE HIMSELF TO THE ART OF MUSIC
OWING TO THE CLAIMS MADE ON HIS TIME
BY OTHER FIELDS OF LABOUR
FORGETS NOT TO ENCOURAGE BY HIS SYMPATHY AND KINDNESS
THOSE WHO ARE PRESSING FORWARD IN ITS PATHS.

TO THE SAME.

October 6.

‘On my return to Oxford I found your book on my table, and I must thank you once more for your great kindness. I feel ashamed and almost saddened when I read your dedication. There was a time when I thought I should devote the whole of my life to music, and a very happy time it was.

‘But new interests carried me away in quite a different direction, and though I tried for a time to keep up my music, I soon found out that music was not a thing to play with, and that one should make up one’s mind to be either its priest and minister, or a silent worshipper.

‘There is a story of a young clergyman exclaiming, “What is the use of the laity?” I am glad you do not share that feeling with regard to music, but consider mere listeners like myself (and particularly silent listeners) an essential element of the musical community.’

On his return to Oxford Max Müller settled down to work, finishing the new edition of his Lectures on Language, which were now stereotyped, and getting on with the fifth volume of the Rig-veda. His wife was away from home for some time, the mother-aunt being very ill, and requiring some one constantly with her.

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, September 17, 1871.

‘Sharing the happiness of other people, entering into their feelings, living life over once more in them and with them, that is all that remains to old people. I suppose it was meant to be so, the principal object of life being the overcoming of self in every sense of the word.

‘In fact, as one gets older death seems hardly to make so wide a gulf: a few years more or less, that is all. Meantime, we know in whose hands we all are, that life is very beautiful; but death has its beauty too.’

In the November of this year Max Müller had the gratification of hearing from India that his Sanskrit Grammar, of which the second edition had appeared in 1870, was extensively used there. A friend wrote from Benares, ‘Your Grammar seems now very near perfection. Your Hitopadesa (the first of the handbooks for the study of Sanskrit) is used in the English department of our College, and is valued by the boys, but not much bought—they are too poor.’

TO F. PALGRAVE, ESQ.

PARKS END, December 26, 1871.

'MY DEAR PALGRAVE,—As a Christmas treat I have been reading Shakespeare's Sonnets—as marvellous as ever, but even more difficult! Now can you tell me (p. 81 of your edition), how do you construe "Will bestow it"? Is it will enrich it, endow it, viz. my wit? Why did you leave out the sonnet—

"A woman's face with nature's own hand painted"?

How do you construe p. 76—

"I will not praise that purpose not to sell"?

These are only a few queries, and they refer to points where I believe I am simply stupid; as to other matters, one might go on asking for ever. On the whole I like Massey—he leaves me freest. Best wishes to you and yours.'

CHAPTER XIX

1872

Memorial to Bishop Patteson. Offer of Professorship at Strassburg. Rig-veda, Vol. V. Death of sister-in-law. Strassburg. Baden. Munich. Life of Stockmar. Switzerland. Dr. Stanley Select Preacher. Freiligrath's poem.

FROM the moment that it was settled that the University of Strassburg should be reorganized under German auspices, Baron Roggenbach, who was entrusted with the arrangements, endeavoured to attract to it many of the leading German Professors. The Baron had discussed the subject with Max Müller on his return from Ems in 1871, and through the winter the thought of possibly settling in Strassburg as Sanskrit Professor was constantly before him. Max determined to come to no decision before trying how life in Germany really suited him, and therefore only undertook to give a course of lectures at Strassburg in the summer semester of 1872.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

January 1, 1872.

‘MY DEAR GOOD MOTHER,—The first letter of the new year must be for you, and may God make it a pleasant year to you—as pleasant as it can be at your age. I hope we shall have a happy meeting this year. I have not yet made any plans for the summer, though I have an idea, if I am well and strong enough, of giving a course of lectures at Strassburg. I have had a very cordial invitation to do so, but I have not yet accepted, for it will give me a good deal of work, and too much work does not pay. It is possible the opening of the University may be postponed till the autumn, and at that time I could not leave Oxford. Well, that is just an idea for the new year. At all events I intend to make an early start from here, and settle somewhere for the summer in Germany with all my belongings. It is not good for the children to travel about, and is also too expensive.

Where do you think we had best go? We had a quiet Christmas. The Meyers sent us venison and a Marzipan, and Trübner sent a Stolle, so that we had some German Christmas things. Have I told you that Klaus Groth is coming in the spring to Oxford to give three lectures before the University on German literature? He gets £50, and he and his wife will stay with us. I am going this week for a couple of days to Woburn Abbey, the Duke of Bedford's.

From Woburn Abbey he wrote to his wife:—

January 4.

‘Here I am in the grand old place. I had a pleasant drive from the station, some seven miles—beautiful sunshine, and the Park looked as green as in summer. Mr. Hastings Russell and his son received me very kindly. We walked about, saw the Park and the Sculpture Gallery and the Chinese Dairy, &c. What an extraordinary nest for one human bird to build himself for his passage through life! When Bunsen was here he told the late Duke, after admiring everything in the way in which he could admire, that he was truly thankful he was not Duke of Bedford. Mr. Russell seemed quite to understand what he meant. I try to keep up my reputation as a historian, but it requires great presence of mind when you are told of every picture: That was the famous Lord A., that was his beautiful daughter-in-law, the Duchess of B., and so it goes on—enough to pluck a first-class man. My great difficulty is to find my room<sup>1</sup>. I wander and wander, till at last some kind person takes me in tow. However, here I am, landed safe in my room, and when the dinner bell rings I hope they will send for me!’

In February Max Müller wrote a letter to the Times advocating a memorial to his friend Bishop Patteson, whose murder in one of the Melanesian Islands had been mentioned this year in the Queen's Speech. He received letters of thanks from many members of the Bishop's family. ‘To have known such a man,’ says Max Müller, ‘is one of life's greatest blessings. In his life of purity, unselfishness, and devotion to man and faith in a higher world, those who have eyes to see may read the best, the most real Imitatio Christi. In his death, following so closely on his prayer for forgiveness for his enemies—“for they know not what they do”—we have witnessed once more a truly Christ-like death.’ From this time onwards Max Müller felt an interest in the Melanesian Mission above any other.

<sup>1</sup> Max Müller had not the least bump of locality.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

March 3, 1872.

'I should have written sooner, but I have had so much correspondence lately about Strassburg that I had time for nothing else. They have made me all sorts of offers, but I have come to no decision, though I am often drawn towards returning to Germany. The Government offers me 4,000 thalers a year (£600), and will keep the Professorship open for me till Easter, 1873. I have hit on this plan: I will leave this early in May and give a course of lectures in Strassburg, during the Summer Term, on "The Results of Comparative Philology." This binds me in no way, and I can form an idea as to whether I am suited for the work of a German Professor or not. Roggenbach writes I could live near Baden-Baden and go in by train on lecture days. G. and the children will not come till the end of June, so as not to interrupt the children's classes. The lectures end early in August, and I can then make further plans; so as soon as you feel up to it you can come to Strassburg and keep house for me. In the winter I shall in any case return to Oxford, whatever I may ultimately decide on doing. You can fancy how all this has occupied me. I think with an income of 10,000 thalers, of which we need not lay by anything, we could lead a far pleasanter life than we can in England. Naturally, the children are my chief thought, and whether their future would be more successful in Germany than here. But all depends on whether I feel I can be of use, and I can fairly judge that after a term. The weather is so mild that the crocuses and violets are in flower in the garden.'

Hardly had this letter been sent off than Max Müller was taken seriously ill, and for some days typhoid fever was feared. The attack resolved itself into violent neuralgia in the head, and he was for many days in bed, unable to move. At the end of the time he wrote the following letter to his mother. After giving an account of his illness, he continues—

Translation.

'Then came the death of Goldstücker<sup>1</sup>, which I felt very much—we had worked together so long. So one goes after the other, and one becomes more and more lonely. He really caused his own death: would see no doctor, though begged to do so, and died from the results of a cold. I was better off, for I had no want of careful nursing. So in May I really am going to Strassburg. The money they offer is a good deal for Germany. They tell me it is the highest salary ever offered to a Professor. As I do not know the life at all, it is pleasant to be able to try it before deciding.'

<sup>1</sup> Whom he knew in Paris and London.

No sooner had the German papers announced that 'Professor Max Müller will kindly give a course of lectures during the Summer Term,' than various attacks, some in anger, some in ridicule, began to appear in the French papers. 'We suppose some advances were made to M. Max Müller, but it would have been too great a condescension on his part, too heroic a sacrifice, to exchange the fat (sic) endowments of Oxford for (from the English point of view) a very modest Stipendium.' 'It will be a great honour for the Prussians of Strassburg, and it is only bare politeness on their part to announce that M. Max Müller will kindly give a course of lectures.' 'Many people in France will be astonished that M. Max Müller, a Foreign Member of our Institute and pupil of Burnouf, should hasten, at the first moment, to deliver German lectures on a soil that we can never cease to consider French!' 'M. Max Müller would have done well if out of regard to France, where he has many friends and admirers, he had waited till the second term, and not associated himself with the inauguration of this University.' The same paper, in mentioning Deutsche Liebe as published anonymously, says 'the author perhaps shrank from putting his name to a novelette, or probably was afraid of arousing feelings of retrospective jealousy in the wife he had married in England.' Deutsche Liebe came out in 1857, two and a half years before he married. Finally, the article declares that M. Max Müller is determined to aid in the Germanizing of Alsace by the lectures he has kindly consented to give at the German University.' So sensitive did the French continue, that it was only in the late autumn of 1881 that Max Müller, who was elected in 1869, ventured to take his seat at the French Institute and make his address of admission, which was constantly interrupted in the beginning by the younger members with disagreeable and sneering remarks, till his friends succeeded at last in enforcing silence.

TO DR. KIELHORN.

Translation.

PARKS END, April 6, 1872.

‘I did indeed hope that you would make your return journey via England, and that I should be enabled to congratulate you and your future wife in person. So I must do it now at least by letter and in a great hurry. May you be as happy as you deserve to be, and may the Indian years of exile be followed by a happy return to the German home. Write to me soon, when you have arrived in Bombay or Poonah. I have been ill over a month; however, I am better now, and Volume V of the Rig-veda is completed, with the exception of the last four pages. I must send it to you to India, also a little keepsake from me for your wedding, which I hoped to have given you in person.

‘I have felt Goldstücker’s death much; I had known him for such a long time, and small literary differences disappear entirely when we stand at the grave of a dear old friend. I hope to acquire his library for Strassburg. Your old countryman, ‘M. M.’

The fifth volume of his great work was now ready. The difficulties of restoring a correct text of Sâyana’s Commentary increased with each volume. The MSS. were more and more faulty, probably because the last part had been less studied and used, and therefore the MSS. were not corrected and kept up with the necessary care. No pains had been spared in scouring all India, even the Southern Provinces, for MSS., but in vain. Max Müller says in his preface to Volume V:—

‘There is not one doubtful or difficult passage in the whole of this work where I have not myself carefully weighed the evidence of the MSS.; not one where I have not myself verified the exact readings of the MSS., even in those portions which were copied and collated for me by others, except where the originals were out of my reach. I believe I have acknowledged, without stint, whatever assistance I have received from other scholars during the progress of my work. They themselves have assured me that I had said more than they deserved or expected. But, as it has been broadly hinted that for certain portions of Sâyana’s Commentary I had parted with my editorial responsibility, I take this opportunity of stating, once for all, that there is no page, no line, no word, no letter, no accent, in the whole of the Commentary for which I am not personally responsible. Nothing was ordered for press that I had not myself carefully examined and revised, and though for certain portions of my edition, as I stated in the preface to each volume, I was relieved of much preliminary labour, the decision in all critical passages, whether for good or evil, always rested with me.'

In this volume is published the first part of the Index Verborum, which was made before Max Müller began the publication of the Rig-veda and Sâyana's Commentary, and it was by its help only he was able to make his way through the difficulties of Sâyana. Professor Benfey, of Göttingen, the veteran Sanskrit scholar, on seeing a few proof-sheets of this Index, wrote: 'I see what extraordinary assistance the publication of this Index Verborum will afford to Vedic studies. It will hardly be possible to render you sufficient thanks for it. I in particular expect to derive the greatest help from it for my Vedic Grammar.'

TO CANON, NOW DEAN, FARRAR.

PARKS END, April 14, 1872.

'I quite know what it is to be overworked, and how new thoughts take possession of one's brain, and make us for a time forget everything else. You must suffer more than I do in that respect, though I assure you just now, with three books printing in English, and proof-sheets of a French and of a German translation, and lectures every day, I sometimes feel quite bewildered. I shall value the dedication of your Lectures<sup>1</sup> very much, and it is very kind of you to have thought of it. Do not suppose that I am unable to value researches which lead to conclusions different from my own. I know it is my own fault if you think so, for I feel so conscious that I cannot express a difference of opinion without giving offence, that I have given up all criticizing. Were I to criticize ——'s book he would never forgive me, so I leave it alone. There are people who can criticize without offending, but I know I cannot—why I cannot tell. Whenever you print your Lectures I shall be very glad to receive the proof-sheets if you like; but, without having seen it, I shall always consider it an honour to have my name connected with any one of your publications.'

In April the Platt-Deutsch poet Klaus Groth and his wife, with whom the Max Müllers had formed an intimate friendship in 1869 in Kiel, paid a visit to Oxford, where he delivered three lectures before the University in German on Platt-Deutsch and its close affinity with English. The genial poet and his charming wife stayed with the Max Müllers, and the visit was keenly enjoyed by both hosts and guests. It was the last time they were to meet. Frau Klaus Groth died a few years later, and after her death the poet remained quietly at Kiel till his death. During their visit Max Müller's sister-in-law, his wife's only sister, to whom Max Müller was warmly attached, was taken alarmingly ill, and though there was a short rally, it was but delusive, and she died May 12, leaving six young children.

<sup>1</sup> Lectures on the Families of Speech.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

May 12, 1872.

'MY DEAR GOOD MOTHER,—I have just had a telegram from G. that her sister died to-day at two. She had been ill for some time. I am going to London, where G. is, by the next train. One of the boys is here and I must take him to London. It is a terrible sorrow.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

Bonn, May 19.

'Only a line to tell you where I am. On Saturday at noon was the funeral, in the same church at Bray where they were married. It was a most affecting scene. That night I started by Dover and Calais for Bonn. To-morrow Roggenbach will meet me here. Wednesday I must give my first lecture.'

His wife remained in England till Max Müller had found a place for her, the children, and his mother. A very few days showed him that Strassburg was impossible for his family : no houses were to be had, and he began looking for one in the neighbourhood. On his way to Strassburg he had been threatened with a terrible misfortune. On arriving at Bonn the large portmanteau containing all his notes and manuscript books, representing the labour of his life, was missing. It had been registered and plombé for Bonn in London, together with a smaller one containing clothes. All inquiries at first seemed in vain. The Crown Prince heard of the disaster, and caused a message to be sent to all principal stations (railways in Germany are all Government possessions) that the portmanteau must be found. The right effect was produced after a time, and the portmanteau with its contents untouched was returned from somewhere near Hamburg ; but no explanation was ever given. Max Müller was nearly ill with anxiety, for the loss would have been irreparable, and really have wrecked his life, as far as his work was concerned ; but he never told either his wife or mother at the time all he was going through.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

STRASSBURG, May 22.

'Yes! really in Strassburg—raining, as everywhere. I have found a lodging, but a very small one—two rooms and a very small bedroom. The want of rooms is terrible. Write and say how you are, and whether and when you can come. It can be done, but I cannot promise you much enjoyment till we have a house in the country.'

Max Müller soon found that the life in Strassburg would not do, even for his mother alone, and postponed her arrival. His time at Strassburg was a thorough success, in spite of the discomforts. He found that he could lecture in German without any of the physical fatigue that his English lectures always gave him. He had fifty hearers, the largest class of all, and gave private Sanskrit lessons as well. But what he most enjoyed was the constant intercourse with men, each of whom was a distinguished representative of his own particular line of studies. As there were no arrangements for food in their various lodgings they formed a sort of club at an hotel, and met every day for early dinner and supper. Max Müller made many acquaintances with the rising scholars in Germany who had gathered at Strassburg, as the French papers said, 'to Germanize the French inhabitants.' On June 1 he writes to his wife :—

'No rooms fit for mother; every one is complaining. We are mostly "grass widowers" or bachelors and don't mind. There are no servants. The lectures in themselves are a great pleasure to me, and I see they are liked, but they take a great deal of time. I have to lecture six times a week, and one is not accustomed to that in Oxford, where I only give twenty-four lectures in the whole year!'

Max Müller's inaugural lecture, 'On the Results of Comparative Philology,' has been translated and printed in Chips, Volume IV. It was published by request as soon as delivered, and widely circulated in Germany.

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

STRASSBURG, 4 REGENBOGENGASSE,

May 31, 1872.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,—I should have written before, but I had to wait a little to see how matters arranged themselves. Up to the present time I like it very much, and I find it much easier and much less of a strain to speak German than English. I have about forty to fifty hearers for Comparative Philology, and ten to twelve for Sanskrit Grammar. Whether this will continue I do not know. What is wanting here is a guiding spirit. We seem to be like a carriage without a driver—it can’t go on like this very long. There is an immense deal still to arrange, two Roggenbachs are hardly sufficient for all there is to do. Lodgings are like lake-dwellings (Pfahlbauten). I cannot find a house for my family, but I feel quite well notwithstanding. Yes, after four sleepless nights, my portmanteau arrived. It caused me real suffering. My box of books is still on the road.’

TO HIS WIFE.

STRASSBURG, June 4, 1872.

‘Why is there so much suffering in this world? I cannot think it improves us much, and yet it must have its purpose. All these are questions far too high for us—we are like children, and more than children when we come to think of them. All we know is that when we catch a glimpse of God’s handiwork, either in the natural or moral world, it is so wonderfully perfect, so beyond all our measures, that we feel safe, as in a good ship, however rough the sea may be. Whatever we may believe or hope, or wish for, will be far exceeded by that higher Will and Wisdom which supports all, even us little souls.’

STRASSBURG, June 6, 1872.

‘My work here answers well, and the young men seem to like it. To me it is no effort, and quite a new sensation. I had no idea that the effort of lecturing in English was so great. What takes up my time here is preparing the Lectures, particularly as I have few books, and have to hunt up things wherever I can find them.’

On June 12 Max Müller was commanded to Baden-Baden to dine with the German Empress. He had first seen the Empress some years before at Coblenz, and always considered her to be one of the best educated women he knew.

He thus describes the scene to his wife :—

‘I was really overwhelmed with kindness. First the Empress made me a speech in the presence of the whole Court, thanking me for all I had done for Germany in England, and which she said had had more influence than I knew. Then she thanked me for the sacrifice I had made in giving up my summer vacation and rest for the new University of Strassburg, and hoped my example would lead others to do the same. Lastly, she said she knew from her last stay in England what people felt there at the thought of my going away. In fact I was quite overpowered. At dinner I sat opposite to her, and she talked to me a great deal; and after dinner, when all were going away, she called me to her, made me sit down, gave me her hand, and again thanked me most heartily. I stayed half an hour, and we talked of many things. It was very interesting to see and speak with the first German Empress thus face to face.’

TO HERR GEORGE VON BUNSEN.

STRASSBURG, June 17, 1872.

‘I am still quite alone here, but my wife and children come from England, and my mother from Chemnitz in about a week. I have taken a house in Baden-Baden; I shall lecture here from Tuesday to Friday, and Friday to Tuesday live in Baden-Baden. The lectures are a delight to me. It is a real pleasure to speak without any effort. I cannot think of future plans. For one thing Strassburg is not what it should be. We want not only one, but four Roggenbachs (one for each Faculty, and one for the University) if we are to create something new and great.’

TO PROFESSOR BERNAYS.

Translation.

STRASSBURG, 4 REGENBOGENGASSE,

July 4, 1872.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,—It is beautiful here, but it is impossible to get to know about anything, so I come to you. I have found a quotation assigned to Aristotle to the following effect: “God, who is One, receives from us names according to the various visions which we come to see.” Can you verify this quotation for me, and may it be assigned to Aristotle? Ever faithfully yours.’

The end of June Max Müller’s wife and children arrived at Baden-Baden, and were joined the next week by his old mother. A pleasant summer was spent in the pretty villa he had secured there in the Lichtenthaler-Allee on the outskirts of the town, and when the lectures were over at Strassburg, constant excursions were made by the whole party to all the beautiful places in the neighbourhood. His kind old friend Baroness Bunsen and two of her daughters were living at Carlsruhe, and several visits were paid them there. The end of July, Max Müller attended the fourth centenary of the University at Munich as delegate from Oxford. On the day of his arrival, after a long night's journey from Baden, he found the place already crowded; more than 2,000 guests had arrived.

TO HIS WIFE.

MUNICH, August 1.

'It is hard work here, but I get through it very well. Yesterday was the reception of all the deputies. I had to speak for England, Holland, and Sweden. It went off very well. In the evening I saw Lohengrin, but after two acts the music was too much for me, and I went home. I had telegraphed for my silk gown, hood, and cap, and they have arrived; so to-day, in the public procession, Oxford will be grandly represented. After the procession there will be speeches, dinner, &c.'

August 2.

'The amount of festivities one has to go through is great, but I am still afloat. I suppose you see the accounts in the newspapers. During the procession yesterday, my gown, hood, and cap were much admired. We dined in the Odeon, about 400 people. Döllinger presided; on his right and left the two Bavarian Princes, then the Prime Minister, and then I. I was surrounded with stars; I believe I was the only man of the 400 who had not some little star or ribbon. Last night it poured, so I went home; I don't know whether there was a torchlight procession. To-day again festivities from morning till evening.'

The festivities ended with a great Commerz, or evening gathering, of all the students in one of the Beer Gardens, at which the Bavarian Princes were present, and to which all the delegates, professors, &c., were invited. The total number of guests was 3,377. Dr. Döllinger was then Rector Magnificus. At the opening ceremony, as it was impossible that all the delegates should deliver congratulatory speeches, the assembled delegates elected Professor von Sybel to speak for the German, and Max Müller for the foreign Universities. In his speech Max Müller reminded his hearers that when he was a German student it was highly criminal to believe in a United German Empire; that day he stood before them having just finished a course of lectures at Strassburg, the first University of the United German Empire.

In his reply Dr. Döllinger complimented Max Müller as nobly representing the bond which united the Munich University with the Universities of the whole Teutonic race.

‘By education and culture, as by birth, you belong to Germany . . . the splendid task has fallen to you—and I believe it is the first instance in the history of England—of acting as interpreter of German science . . . in that University in which the flower of the English nation receives its education. We look up to Oxford as an elder sister, for she existed centuries before us, and has had a glorious history, such as no German University has had, and our wishes are that Oxford may for ever remain what she has been for centuries, both to England and the world.’

TO DR. MORITZ CARRIÈRE<sup>1</sup>.

Translation.

BADEN-BADEN, SCHILLERSTRASSE,

August 4, 1872.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,—I have returned well satisfied, but also very tired, to Baden-Baden this morning. Many thanks for all your kindness, and for the great pleasure which you procured for me. I had till now no idea of such a festival, and I must send a short description of it to Oxford, to the Vice-Chancellor. My words about Oxford are easily reported, but not the words of warm sympathy which Döllinger uttered in his reply. Do you think that they could be found in print anywhere? I have the gist of his speech clear in my mind, but the ipsissima verba would of course produce a far greater impression in Oxford, and coming from Döllinger they are of historical value, and deserve more than an ephemeral existence. . . . My kind regards to Baron von Liebig. Ever yours.’

Early in this year Max Müller had made arrangements with Messrs. Longmans to publish a translation of the Life of Baron Stockmar, the intimate friend of King Leopold, the Queen of England, and Prince Albert. It was written by Stockmar’s son, and threw a new light on many things connected especially with the life of King Leopold—his first marriage, the death of Princess Charlotte, the offer of the

<sup>1</sup> Philosophical writer and poet—a friend from Berlin University days.

Greek throne, and the final election to Belgium. Max Müller's old friend Morier had been asked to find a translator. The book appeared in the autumn, and a large edition was sold. It had, of course, the advantage throughout of Max Müller's careful superintendence.

TO R. B. D. MORIER, ESQ. (Minister at Munich).

BADEN-BADEN, August 12, 1872.

'MY DEAR MORIER,—I was very sorry when I was at Munich that you were not there. Everything else was quite perfect, but it took me nearly a week to recover from the feast, both material and intellectual. There were many inquiries for you; I hope you are better by this time. There is nothing so good after a bout of gout as Baden-Baden; the neighbourhood here is most charming, a real Paradise. Now I want to know when we may have the introduction to Stockmar. We are getting on well with the translation, and Longman wants to begin printing as soon as possible. Abeken's death is a great loss. He was a faithful friend, the only respectable element in the Pool of Varzin.'

TO HERR GEORGE VON BUNSEN

(who was coming to the Black Forest).

BADEN, August 21.

'This is delightful—at present we are still tied to this place. We intended going to Switzerland, but our governess has fallen ill in Hanover, and so my wife cannot leave the children. So I hope we shall be able to see much of you. It is so beautiful here, and we three generations, grandmother, mother, and children, enjoy our time here much. . . . Shall we meet at Gernsbach on Friday?'

Early in September Max Müller presented to the University of Strassburg a magnificent gift from the University of Oxford, 650 volumes of the publications of the Clarendon Press, uniformly bound in calf, every volume containing the inscription—

PRESENTED TO THE LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF STRASSBURG
BY THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, 1872.

The books were all ranged in order in one of the halls, where a large company gathered to hear Max Müller's address, in which he gave a sketch of the constitution of the University of Oxford, so totally unlike all foreign Universities, and of its principal institutions, buildings, &c. Later in the month Max Müller and his wife made a short excursion in Switzerland, visiting the Bernese Oberland for the first time. During the stay at Baden Princess Hohenlohe, half-sister of our Queen, died, and Princess Alice (Princess Louis of Hesse) came to Baden to attend the funeral ceremonies. Max Müller had more than one long interview with the Princess. He was much struck by the depth and earnestness of her mind, and her great dignity coupled with a remarkable charm of manner. On his return to England the Princess sent Max Müller the last work by Strauss, Der alte und der neue Glaube, as 'Her Royal Highness was persuaded that, quite apart from the question of argument with its contents, either in whole or in part, he would read the work with great interest.'

TO HIS WIFE.

OXFORD, November 4.

'I had a letter from Strassburg. There are more than 400 students, eighty more in the philosophical faculty. I do not know how it is, but I cannot bring myself to write yet. I wait for some hint, for something to happen, which will show me what I ought to do. I have always found a finger-post on my way through the world; I cannot find one just now.'

TO THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

November 17, 1872.

'MY DEAR STANLEY,—What I meant was that kings, like Ministers, like members of Parliament, like judges, et hoc genus omne, are men, and it is foolish to frame theories according to which they are supposed to be anything else. We do not want friendless or heartless sovereigns, and in a constitutional State the responsibility of the Ministers ought to cover, not only the sovereign in the abstract, but the sovereign as he is, surrounded by wife, children, friends, &c. After all, the sovereign cannot act except through responsible Ministers, and would at every crisis have to choose between his Ministers and his friends. The absurdity of certain constitutional theories reached its acme when people complained that Prince Albert acted as the friend and adviser of the Queen. Stockmar is very strong on that point in his Mémoires, and I confess his remarks seem to me full of political wisdom. I should not at all be surprised if the book caused a commotion.

‘We shall meet at dinner on Saturday at Balliol—to meet Baron Rothschild.

‘I have been reading Strauss’s last book, and I should like to know what you think of it. I suppose it was sent to you as it was sent to me.

‘Stockmar will not be out before the 30th, but I hope to give you a copy next Saturday.’

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

PARKS END, November 23, 1872.

‘I have asked my publisher to send you one of the early copies of Baron Stockmar’s Mémoires. I feel certain you will find the book interesting, and I only hope you may not think the English too German. Though the two languages are so closely related, one hardly ever finds a word in English that will completely render the purport of a German word. Those words which are etymologically and historically the same in German and English are the most treacherous, for they never mean exactly the same in the two languages. One learns here, too, the old lesson that those who differ little are far more apt to misunderstand each other than those who differ toto coelo. I have tried in my preface to smooth certain susceptibilities, which no doubt are perfectly justified, but which I should regret to see discussed in public any more than has been done already.’

It will perhaps be remembered that Dean Stanley was this year nominated by Council as one of the Select Preachers. A most determined opposition was started by Mr.—afterwards Dean—Burgon and Dean Goulburn, aided by Mr. Golightly, the champion of the Evangelical party in Oxford. The following letter alludes to this:—

PARKS END, OXFORD, December 8, 1872.

‘MY DEAR STANLEY,—We may win, and that is good—we may be beaten, and perhaps that may be better, in order to open people’s eyes to the intolerable intolerance to which Oxford has to submit. Convocatio delenda est ought henceforth to be the watchword of all friends of the University.

‘For the present we mean to act. Edwin Palmer is very angry; Gathorne Hardy and Mowbray disapprove; Pusey and Liddon abstain. Bernard attended our meeting. Prince Leopold is quite irate! The great question is, can the London lawyers come down to vote?

Ever yours full of hope, but very savage,

‘MAX MÜLLER.’

The London lawyers, headed by the venerable Sir Stephen Lushington, came down in numbers to vote. Max Müller, who had delivered a lecture at Liverpool the night before, returned to record his vote, much to the dismay of the friends at whose house he was staying, and who were having a large evening party in his honour. Broad Street was nearly filled when the Balliol M.A.'s turned out to support one of the most illustrious and well-loved of their scholars: the great public schools sent up their masters, and the victory was a very complete one. As the numbers were read out Mr. Burgon and Dean Goulburn were seen to wring each other's hands in the area, as if to say 'better luck next time.' When Dean Stanley preached his first sermon, and stood again in the University pulpit after nine years, St. Mary's was densely crowded, every inch of standing room being filled.

The following letter to his mother gives a glimpse of Max Müller with his children. The birthdays of the father and mother were joyfully observed, and as the children grew older they always had some little surprise ready for the day, besides their long-prepared presents.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

December 12.

'I wish you had been here, and especially in the evening, when the children acted for us very prettily. One thing was really very good. You should have seen Ada as Spring, when she recited Die Herzen auf, die Fenster auf. She did it with such spirit as quite surprised me. The whole poem prestissimo, and really so well done, it could not have been better, and she had arranged and thought it out quite alone. Then they came in dressed up with wigs and coloured eyebrows, Beatrice as a Marquise, Wilhelm as Schneewittchen, so that one could not recognize them. They sang several songs in English and German—in fact the whole was a great success.'

TO THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

December 23, 1872.

'I have just been reading your speech at Liverpool. There are some notes in it which delighted my German heart, though I am afraid that much of what you say of the simplicity of German life and love of knowledge for knowledge's sake applies to the past rather than to the present. The dangers of success and prosperity are clearly discernible there, particularly in the large towns, and the two most important elements in the political life of the nation, the Schoolmasters and the Civil Servants (the much-abused but in Germany invaluable Bureaucracy), find it almost impossible to hold their own, and to command the respect which was formerly paid to them. I read with deep interest what you said about Strauss's new book. Not quite a fortnight ago I had wrestled with Strauss before a Liverpool audience, though I did not mention his name. The book in itself seems to me slight, but it acquires great importance as being the last confession of a man such as Strauss. The only strong position in his book is Darwinism, or Revolutionism, which counts as many believers in England as in Germany, if not more. The problems started by Darwin, H. Spencer, Haeckel, &c., are matters of life and death, and they must become the battlefield for the next philosophical campaign. I confess I have no reply to some of their arguments, and I should have liked very much to hear from you with what weapons you think that the victorious progress of their philosophy is to be stopped. It is impossible to decline battle, though no doubt it is fraught with dangers, nor do I see a chance of victory unless many positions which have become untenable are freely surrendered. I am preparing some lectures on the subject for the Royal Institution in March, but I feel far from confident. I am afraid I shall not be able to avail myself of your kind invitation to Hawarden Castle; I have been a martyr to toothache lately, and there is such an accumulation of work that I shall want all my time when I am able to work. Allow me to send you two lectures of mine on German and English University life.

‘With the best wishes of the season.’

At the close of this year there was great suffering in North Germany owing to a terrible storm in the Baltic. The sea rose to a fearful height and devastated miles of coast, causing great loss of life and property, especially in the island of Rügen. The poet Freiligrath wrote a beautiful poem, which he called ‘Wilhelm Müller, a Spirit Voice,’ in which he represented Wilhelm Müller, some of whose best poems had been written from Rügen, as calling on his countrymen to aid the sufferers. The poet's son saw the poem in a paper, and it elicited not only substantial help, but the following letter to the author.

TO HERR FERDINAND FREILIGRATH.

*Translation.*PARKS END, OXFORD, December 25, 1872.

‘DEAR SIR,—I have only lately seen your beautiful poem in the Augsburger Zeitung of December 8, and therefore my thanks come very late. But I must give utterance to what I, as the son of Wilhelm Müller, felt in reading your poem, and I thank you from my heart that you have put in the mouth of a poet, now half-forgotten by the largest portion of the German public, words which most poets would have kept as their own utterance. This has given great delight not only to his son, but to his widow, who is still living, and they both send you their thanks. May the recollection of the too early departed poet, and the love of the German people for the living poet, bring a rich response to your appeal. Fate has hitherto kept us from meeting in England, and it is therefore all the greater satisfaction to me to shake you by the hand, if only in spirit. With true respect,

‘Your more than thirty years’ admirer,

‘MAX MÜLLER.’

On December 30 Max Müller writes to his mother:—

Translation.

‘Stockmar’s Life came out on November 30 and seems very much liked, and is selling well. The first week 1,900 of the 3,000 copies were sold, and 500 in America. We sent one to the Queen. Prince Leopold complimented G. very prettily on her knowledge of German. He is here as an undergraduate, and came here one day to five o’clock tea. He does not dine out. He is so simple and unaffected.’

Another large edition of the Lectures on Language (the seventh) was published this year.

CHAPTER XX

1873-1874

German University finances. Strassburg Professorship declined. Schliemann. Lectures on Darwin's Philosophy of Language. Emerson. Veddahs. Cromer. Lecture in Westminster Abbey. Order pour le Mérite. Member of Hungarian Academy. Prince and Princess of Roumania. Oriental Congress. Last volume of Rig-veda. American attack on Max Müller.

THE New Year found Max Müller quietly at Oxford, working at the last volume of the Veda, and at his Lectures on Religion, given in 1870, but never published, and preparing a short course of lectures for the British Institution on Language as the barrier between man and beast, which he called 'On Darwin's Philosophy of Language.' This was Prince Leopold's first year at Oxford as an undergraduate. Max Müller saw him constantly, and ever afterwards recalled their intercourse with genuine interest and affection, and he always hoped that the Prince might do much for his country as an enlightened patron of literature and art.

The following letter to Dr. Althaus refers to the dedication to Max Müller of Bulwer's Coming Race. The work was published anonymously, and it was only in the obituary notice in the Times that the secret of its authorship was disclosed.

OXFORD, January 1, 1873.

'Many thanks for Bulwer. Only think, I never knew him, never even saw him, and learnt first after his death, who had written The Coming Race. One ought not to be proud of anything, but I was very much delighted.'

TO R. B. D. MORIER, ESQ.

OXFORD, January 1, 1873.

'MY DEAR OLD FELLOW,—Best wishes for the New Year. I don't know whether you see many English papers; old Stockmar has been reviewed in most of them, and it is very interesting to see how Johannes Bos has looked at him from different points. There was one review in the Morning Post more or less official, or Palmerstonian. It might be a good subject for an article in the Augsburger, or some other Zeitung, to show how the book has been received and partly digested in England. I have had several private letters which show that the book has told in various ways. I hope you observed Gladstone's civilities in his last Glasgow speech (before he came to Strauss). Do you know of anybody who could write such an article? Young Stockmar is not the man to do it; he is evidently put out by the critics, as if it was worth while writing a book to which everybody is to say Amen. Ever yours.'

TO CANON, NOW DEAN, FARRAR.

January 6, 1873.

'Allow me to thank you at once for the copy of your Lectures on the Families of Speech, and for your very kind dedication. You say much more than I deserve, and all I can do is to do my best to deserve some part of your good opinion, by what I still hope to do for the Science of Language. At present my hands and my thoughts are full of other work. I am writing lectures on the "Science of Religion," and to know what to say and what not to say in four introductory lectures is no easy matter. In fact, I should gladly retire from my task, if I could, for I hardly feel up to work, and I am not satisfied with what I have written. As soon as I see a little daylight, and find leisure for other work, I shall read your lectures, and after I have done so I hope to write to you again, or, still better, have a talk with you on points on which we differ, and on points on which we agree. In the meantime accept my hearty thanks.'

Mr. Gladstone had addressed some inquiries to Max Müller on the constitution of German Universities, to which the following letter gives an answer:—

PARKS END, January 12, 1873.

'I have no book at hand where I could find the exact sum allowed to each University by Government, but such books exist, and I have asked George Bunsen at Berlin to send me something like a Blue Book on the subject. The Universities derive their whole income from Government. Even in cases where there are ancient foundations still preserved, the funds or the land must be administered under the cognizance of Government, generally by a Government

Commissioner. The only other source of income consists in the fees paid by the students. These in the case of the principal Professors, who lecture on Anatomy, Church History, or such like indispensable subjects, are considerable. Savigny, being Professor of Law at Berlin, declined the Ministry of Justice, unless his income as Minister could be raised to what his income was as Professor. A class of 400 students would yield a Professor during the two semesters 1,600 louis d'or, and some of the Professors in my time used to give two courses of lectures in each semester. The highest salary now paid to a Professor is only 4,000 thalers, or £600, yet even that is more than the average income of a Professor at Oxford, with the exception of the Theological Chairs. Considering the general income of the country, the sum expended by Government on the Universities is high. The number of Universities is large, each independent Prince wished to have a University, and I believe they will be kept up even now, for they have proved useful centres of intellectual life in every part of Germany. The difficulty to which you allude of teachers examining their own pupils is little felt. The Professor, lecturing to a large class, does not know many of the students personally. The examination is always conducted by a Commission consisting of five or six Professors. Besides, the University degree does not confer any tangible rights. In order to become a lawyer, a clergyman, a physician, a schoolmaster, every candidate has to pass the Government Examination, and with these the Professors, quâ Professors, have nothing to do. It was to me a matter of great interest to compare the working of a German University, such as Strassburg, with what I knew of Oxford. Each country, no doubt, fashions its own Universities, and makes them to supply the real wants of the people. Yet there is much to be learnt from a comparison of the two systems. I shall be very glad to undergo a cross-examination when you are in London again. I believe the time will come when something will have to be done, not only for Ireland, but for England too. Oxford wants new life. Both teaching and learning seem to me to be regarded as a burden, which ought not to be. I send you a few papers which may partly answer your purpose. In the little calendar you will find the statistics of the German Universities, as far as their teaching staff and the number of students are concerned. In the plan of the lectures you see what is done even by so small a University as Strassburg. You can see how almost every Professor has a laboratory, seminary, hospital, or institution, supported by assistants, where he works with his pupils apart from his lectures. These institutions are the real secret of the success achieved by the German Universities. In several cases the students who are admitted to them receive, while they are at work, an exhibition or fellowship. Anyhow, these institutions are the real workshop where the tradition is handed down from generation to generation. The Colleges with their fellowships might be made to answer some such purpose. There are many Professors in Germany who would have spoken like Döllinger on Materialism. What I like in the German Universities is the frankness with which everybody states the convictions at which he has arrived. Strauss's book has been very severely treated in Germany. Yet there is a crisis going on there as in England; something is dying, whether we like it or not. To my mind Mansel's Bampton Lectures and the reception they met with were a sign of the times. They seemed to me far more irreligious than Herbert Spencer. They left religion as a mere cry of despair. Frederick Maurice saw the tendency of that school of thought which erects an insurmountable barrier between the finite mind and the infinite, but he could not make himself understood. Mansel and Herbert Spencer seem to me at the present moment to rule at Oxford in the two opposite camps, and I do not wonder that they produce in each much the same results. I spent some interesting hours with Döllinger at Munich. He is a man of great courage in thought and word; but, though he is a strong and vigorous old man, he shrinks from action. He is Erasmus over again; a rougher nature will be wanted to do the rougher work.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, January 18, 1873.

'Stockmar is selling well. The Queen has thanked me in the kindest manner for the preface. Prince Christian wrote at the Queen's desire, and she expressed herself kindly about the book altogether. . . . I had almost forgotten the Emperor (Napoleon). Let him rest in peace. One must not judge him, but few men have caused so much misery in the world as he. He was always liked in England, so his death has called out a good deal of sympathy. The last years of his life must have been a hard penance.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

February 16.

'The Strassburg uncertainty is over. I wrote them word that with all my private work I could only lecture one term in the year, and on account of the other Professors they could not arrange that. I am glad, for I had done my duty, and should have had to make a great pecuniary sacrifice, and it would have taken up too much of my time, and I could not with a good conscience have undertaken more than I offered. My chief thought has been about the children, and whether it would not be better for them to be brought up in Germany. That is often a weight on me, for the arrangements here are very imperfect. One can manage for the girls, but how it will be for Wilhelm, I do not yet see. But time will show. As yet he learns nothing, but is healthy and merry. G. is not very unhappy about Strassburg.'

TO DEAN STANLEY.

OXFORD, February 21, 1873.

'I now have lectures in London and Birmingham. As soon as these are over the printing of Volume VI [of the Rig-veda] will begin, and then I shall go on with the translation. I found my work so in arrears, that for the present, at least, I have given up a change to Strassburg. I am very sorry, for the life in Strassburg was like a mental sea-bath. I wrote last week to give it up.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, February 25.

'Yesterday I dined with Prince Leopold, and he said the Queen had charged him to tell me how pleased she was that I had decided to stay in England. I am writing to Strassburg to found a Stipendium in their University with the 2,000 thalers they paid me last year, for the study of the Veda. It will not hurt me, and I am glad not to take any money from them. The people in Strassburg and Berlin have been very friendly over the whole matter; even Bismarck expressed his sorrow at my decision.'

And thus the uncertainty about Strassburg which had hung over the family for above a year came to an end. The Prize founded by Max Müller, and which bears his name, is given every third year for the best dissertation on 'Vedic Literature,' and may be competed for not merely by present students at Strassburg, but by those who have already taken their degree, provided they studied for at least four terms at that University.

It was in this year that Max Müller made the acquaintance of Dr. Schliemann, the famous excavator, at first by correspondence only. From the first, Max Müller took a great interest in Dr. Schliemann's work; the disinterested character of the discoverer appealed to him, though he often found himself unable to follow Dr. Schliemann's deductions, and to the last he used smilingly to say, 'He destroyed Troy for the last time.' In 1875 Dr. Schliemann paid a visit to Oxford, and stayed with Max Müller, who for several years was instrumental in getting Schliemann's papers and articles inserted in the leading newspapers and periodicals. When Dr. Schliemann exhibited his Trojan treasures at the South Kensington Museum, Max Müller spent some time in London helping him to arrange the things—an arduous task, for, as is well known, though he had the scent of a truffle dog for hidden treasures, he had little or no correct archaeological knowledge, and Max Müller found the things from the four different strata which Schliemann considered he had discovered at Troy in wild confusion—though he maintained they were all carefully packed in different cases. One day when Max Müller was busy over a case of the lowest stratum, he found a piece of pottery from the highest. 'Que voulez-vous?' said Schliemann, 'it has tumbled down!' Not long after, in a box of the highest stratum appeared a piece of the rough pottery from the lowest. 'Que voulez-vous?' said the imperturbable Doctor, 'it has tumbled up!' The friends met again at Maloja in 1885. Dr. Schliemann had meantime finished his beautiful house in Athens, in which two bedrooms were called after Max Müller, and many were the pressing invitations to occupy them; but when Max Müller visited Athens in 1893, his kind friend had passed away. He gave Max Müller a good many things from Mycenae, which are now in the Ashmolean Museum, and also a tiny bit of gold from Agamemnon's grave. The correspondence is of too technical a character to be given here; interesting letters from Max Müller on Athene Glaucopis and Hera Boopis, on the Hindu Svastika, and on Jade tools are inserted in Schliemann's Troja. Dr. Schliemann also gave Max Müller the valuable Tanagra figures, which his friends will remember in the drawing-room at 7, Norham Gardens.

Max Müller's American friend Mr. Conway was at this time preparing an Anthology culled from the religious books of different sects and beliefs. Hence the following letter. In the sentiments of the latter part most people will agree.

TO MONCURE D. CONWAY, ESQ.

PARKS END, March 13, 1873.

‘I can see no objection to your printing a number of verses from the Dhammapada, but as the book is not my own, I think it would be better if you communicated with the publisher, Mr. Trübner. As to lectures, I am at present so overworked that I ought not to make new engagements. I shall have to give three lectures at the Royal Institution, then at Birmingham, and I have my Oxford lectures going on at the same time, so that this is as much as I can safely do. Lastly, a Mythological Society sounds a somewhat ominous name; yet I quite agree with you that it might do good. However, what I should like to see would be a concentration of the different Societies, and the constitution of a London Academy, divided into Sections. So much work and money are now frittered away, and the Transactions and Journals of the numerous Societies have become mere burial-grounds; for who can even cut open their pages? I read with great interest the Index, where I occasionally see your name. Does that paper tell in America? and what is or are the really powerful organs of thought in the United States?’

The end of March the three lectures on Mr. Darwin’s Philosophy of Language were given at the Royal Institution. They were printed in Fraser’s Magazine, and also a very few copies for presentation, but were never republished in a collected form.

The following letter alludes to the completion this spring of Mr. Bellows’ excellent pocket French Dictionary, a copy of which Max Müller always took about with him, and he invariably recommended it as the best type of dictionary he knew in any language:—

TO MR. BELLOWS.

PARKS END, April 2, 1873.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,—Many thanks for your charming Dictionary, which I found here on my return from London. I am too busy just now to do more than admire it, and congratulate you on its successful termination. I know no other pocket Dictionary that could compete with it. Your discoveries at Gloucester are very curious [Roman wall in his own garden], and I hope I shall be able to inspect them some day or other. Just now I am lecturing in London on “Language as the Barrier between Man and Beast,” and I have hardly any thought for anything else. In a few weeks I hope I shall be more free again.’

The next letter refers to an interesting article written by Dr. Althaus in one of the magazines on 'The Germans in England.' Max Müller's is the last name in the article.

TO DR. ALTHAUS.

Translation.

OXFORD, April 13.

'MY DEAR DOCTOR,—I do not know how to thank you. I have just read your essay, and indeed I feel it would be superhuman if, after reading what you say, I did not feel as in a sort of champagne mood. I, of course, know best how much too much you have said of me, but even reducing it by half, there remains so much appreciation which I highly value. I have spent many happy and beautiful years in England, and even the little disappointments do not disturb me, and they cannot blur memory's sunny pictures. The only things I long for are my old friends. One feels more and more alone and solitary, and that feeling draws me so often towards Germany with a great longing. I do not know whether you feel the same. When I was young I did not know what Heimweh meant; now it increases with every new year.'

It was after the lectures in London that Emerson, who was paying his third and last visit to England, came to Oxford with his daughter as Max Müller's honoured guest. Max was one of Emerson's ardent admirers, and had known and loved his writings from his earliest days in England. On the second day of Mr. Emerson's visit, Prince Leopold lunched at 'Parks End' to meet the old man. It was a brilliant May day, and the whole party sat out in the garden after luncheon, and the hours slipped past in pleasant converse, till Prince Leopold proposed an adjournment to his house, which was near at hand, for five o'clock tea, when he delighted Mr. Emerson by showing him many private photographs of the rooms at Windsor, Osborne, and Balmoral. The next day, after attending Mr. Ruskin's lecture, the Max Müllers and Emersons visited him in his rooms at Corpus, where the scene recorded in Auld Lang Syne took place. Mr. Ruskin wrote afterwards to Max Müller to account for it, by saying, 'It chanced that both you and Mr. Emerson happened to say things from which I deeply and entirely dissented, and which reduced me at once to silence.'

TO CHARLES DARWIN, ESQ.

PARKS END, OXFORD, June 29, 1873.

‘SIR,—In taking the liberty of forwarding to you a copy of my Lectures, I feel certain that you will accept my remarks as what they were intended to be—an open statement of the difficulties which a student of language feels when called upon to explain the languages of man, such as he finds them, as the possible development of what has been called the language of animals. The interjectional and mimetic theories of the origin of language are no doubt very attractive and plausible, but if they were more than that, one at least of the great authorities in the science of language—Humboldt, Bopp, Grimm, Burnouf, Curtius, Schleicher, &c.—would have adopted them. However, it matters very little who is right and who is wrong; but it matters a great deal what is right and what is wrong, and as an honest, though it may be unsuccessful, attempt at finding out what is true with regard to the conditions under which human language is possible, I venture to send you my three Lectures, trusting that, though I differ from some of your conclusions, you will believe me to be one of your diligent readers and sincere admirers.’

That the Lectures did not alter Mr. Darwin’s cordial appreciation of Max Müller is shown by the following charming letter, inserted by permission:—

DOWN, BECKENHAM, KENT, July 3, 1873.

‘DEAR SIR,—I am much obliged for your kind note and present of your Lectures. I am extremely glad to have received them from you, and I had intended ordering them. I feel quite sure from what I have read in your works that you would never say anything of an honest adversary to which he would have any just right to object; and as for myself, you have often spoken highly of me, perhaps more highly than I deserve.

‘As far as language is concerned, I am not worthy to be your adversary, as I know extremely little about it, and that little learnt from very few books. I should have been glad to have avoided the whole subject, but was compelled to take it up as well as I could. He who is fully convinced, as I am, that man is descended from some lower animal, is almost forced to believe a priori that articulate language has been developed from inarticulate cries; and he is therefore hardly a fair judge of the arguments opposed to this belief.

‘With cordial respect, I remain, dear Sir,

‘Yours very faithfully,

‘CHARLES DARWIN.’

Walter & Co. N.Y.

J. Max. Müller

Aged 50.

From a Medallion by Bruce Joy

The Lectures were answered by Mr. Darwin's son, whose article was again replied to by Max Müller in the Contemporary Review, called, 'My reply to Mr. Darwin,' which in its turn provoked the violent attack by Professor Whitney on Max Müller described in the next chapter.

During this summer Max Müller sat to Mr. Bruce Joy for a medallion, and later on for a bust, in the habit brodé of the French Institute, the clever artist being his guest whilst the work was carried out. Several pleasant and refreshing visits were paid to the Deanery, Westminster, which Lady Augusta Stanley made a second home to many of her husband's old Oxford friends. The Max Müllers also stayed at Sir William Siemens', for the Civil Engineers' soirée at the South Kensington Museum, an evening long remembered with pleasure, as spent almost entirely with Charles Kingsley looking at the Vernon collection of pictures, which at that time still hung there.

In July Max Müller went to Germany to bring his mother to England. She had been far from well for some months, and he found her at first unwilling to travel, and thus was kept longer in Germany than he expected.

TO HIS WIFE.

July, 1873.

'If we do a thing because we think it is our duty, we generally fail; that is the old law which makes slaves of us. The real spring of our life and our work in life must be love—true, deep love—not love of this or that person, or for this or that reason, but deep human love, devotion of soul to soul, love of God realized where alone it can be, in love of those whom He loves. Everything else is weak, and passes away; that love alone supports us, makes life tolerable, binds the present together with the past and future, and is, we may trust, imperishable.'

Whilst at Chemnitz with his mother, Max Müller wrote to tell Professor Benfey that his Index Verborum of the Rig-veda was printed. He had prepared it himself before he brought out his first volume of the Rig-veda in 1849, and had lately employed a young German to arrange the Index for each one of the six volumes as a whole. It is still of great practical value, as, the references being to hymns and verses and lines, and not to pages, it can be used with any edition of the Rig-veda. He also mentions that a new edition of his Hitopadesa was called for, and of his Sanskrit Grammar in English, 'and yet,' he says, 'I have my hands already quite full.'

The Lectures on the Science of Religion, given in 1870, had been published just before Max Müller went to Germany, and were dedicated to Emerson, 'in memory of his visit to Oxford, and in acknowledgement of constant refreshment of head and heart derived from his writings during the last twenty-five years.'

The volume was favourably received, and called out less adverse criticism than it would have done three years before.

'Professor Max Müller,' says one reviewer, 'properly calls the lectures in this volume "An Introduction." They break ground in the little-trodden path of Comparative Theology. He tells us he is convinced that study here will ultimately produce as great a revolution in our ideas of man's past history, and in the relations and character of the various religions of mankind, as study of natural science has produced in our view of the Creation. Researches in the sphere of history, with the help of Comparative Mythology, prove that there are elements in human nature which must have been primal and original, which could never have been developed, which must have been implanted from the beginning—wherever we place that. That man, as a religious being, possesses such an element or disposition, we conceive Mr. Müller himself has gone far to prove. And the more we find, by comparison of the religions of the world, the distinctness and indestructibility, and yet the essential identity of this element under all varieties of forms of development, the more shall we be compelled to accept the fact of the Divine origin of mankind, and, even amid its worst corruptions, of the community of human nature with the Divine, of the finite with the Infinite.'

So little is still known about the Veddahs, that the following letter to Mr. Hartshorne may be of interest:—

OXFORD, July 27, 1873.

'DEAR SIR,—I have just returned from Germany, and I am afraid that my answer to your letter of June 23 will hardly reach you in time, before you start again on a new visit to the Veddahs. So much has been said about their peculiarities in language, thought, and manners, that a really trustworthy account of them would certainly be most valuable. How difficult such an account is you must know best by this time. In looking at your list of Veddah words I was struck at once by their Pâli, i. e. secondary Sanskrit character. The question therefore, arises, are those Pâli or Sinhalese words later importations, or is it possible to distinguish between an earlier substratum of Veddah speech and these clearly Aryan words? Or, does the Veddah language take its place simply as a degraded Sinhalese dialect, and the Veddah people as a degraded Sinhalese race, instead of being, as generally supposed, a remnant of a primitive and savage race? This question can be solved scientifically by linguistic evidence only. But the solution is most difficult. We must know what corruptions are possible between Veddah and Sinhalese, between Sinhalese and Elu, between Elu and Pâli, between Pâli and Sanskrit. . . . I have marked on your list of Veddah words many that are clearly of Sinhalese kinship, and these are words which constitute the most necessary portion of a language; for instance, the pronouns, words for man, cow, flowers, to cook, to go, &c. &c. Here and there I see a trace of grammatical structure, and you may be certain that there is as much grammar in the Veddah language as in English. You may say, that would not be much, but it presupposes much. No doubt it would be difficult to get an idea of English grammar from a Welsh coal-miner, and your Veddahs have evidently sunk much lower; but with great perseverance something of the grammatical articulation of the language might still be discovered, and has to be discovered, before we can say anything about their origin. I never believe that the Veddah language has no word for two. There may be Veddahs who do not count, or who, as philosophers would say, form no syntheses, but that a language which has a word for I and thou, for eye and ear, should have no sign for the dual concept, I shall never believe. More difficult even than the grammar is the religion of a people like the Veddahs. One occasionally sees accounts in the papers of a witness being sworn in an English Court of Law, and if one took his answers about the Deity, about life and death, and right and wrong, as materials on which to build a theory of the Christian religion, one would still be better off, I suppose, than with the best of the Veddahs. And yet these people have a religion, if one only knows how to disinter it. To call "the propitiation of the spirits of deceased ancestors" the most original form of religion is utterly wrong. It takes thousands of years before we arrive at such ideas. The idea of an ancestor involves the idea of relationship; a belief in deceased, but not yet extinct, ancestors implies the germs of a belief in immortality. The idea of a spirit, or of spirits of deceased persons, belongs to the tertiary age of thought, and as to propitiation, that is a concept not yet 3,000 years old. The time has not come yet for a chronology of religious beliefs; what we want are accurate statements of all manifestations which imply a conception of anything beyond what is given to man by his sensuous experience. All this is a work of very great difficulty, and it is because people do not see the difficulty, that we get so much material which is amusing and may fill volumes about Prehistoric Culture, and yet leaves us exactly where we were before. It is difficult when we have to deal with one individual, to say what he is no more, and what he is not yet; to say the same of a family, a clan, a tribe, a people, is much more difficult. And yet this is what we want to know about the Veddahs, whom many people are so anxious to represent as monkeys and not yet men, but who may be monkeys and men no longer.

‘Excuse haste, and believe me,

‘Yours very truly,

‘F. M. M.’

After Max Müller’s return to England with his mother, the whole family went to Cromer, which proved a time of great interest to him, as bringing him into closer contact with many members of the Gurney and Buxton families, with some of whom he had been associated years before through the marriages of his friends Ernest and George von Bunsen. On his return home he devoted himself to work on the sixth and last volume of the Rig-veda. He had during this year published the text of the Rig-veda in two small octavo volumes, according to the Pada and Samhitâ systems.

But his mind was ere long turned to another subject. His friend Dean Stanley had asked him the year before to give the evening address in Westminster Abbey on Christian Missions. Max Müller had then declined, but the Dean again urged his request this year. It was a bold step on the Dean’s part, who had, however, ascertained that it was perfectly legal. He took the opinion on this point of Lord Coleridge, the Lord Chief Justice of England, who replied, ‘It is perfectly legal, but whether it is expedient.’ ‘I did not ask your opinion on that point,’ rejoined the intrepid little Dean. It needed no small courage in Max Müller to accept; but having ascertained from the Dean that it was legal, he now no longer hesitated, feeling it would put him in a position to say things that had long weighed on him. Having once made up his mind, he was perfectly unmoved by the storm it raised, and set about preparing his discourse with his usual tranquil self-possession and power of detaching himself from public opinion.

TO R. B. D. MORIER, ESQ.

November 3.

‘MY DEAR MORIER,—We had our orgie at All Souls last night, and I thought of you when I was presiding as Sub-Warden (the Warden being ill), supported by two noble lords, Lord Devon and Lord Bathurst, and proposing the different healths of the evening. I also thought of Bellum’s and all that. Don’t you think it is time for me to leave, having reached this exalted pinnacle?’

On December 2 the Max Müllers went to the Deanery at Westminster, and the next day the Lay Sermon was delivered. Charles Kingsley, Theodore Walrond, and Sir Charles Trevelyan dined and attended the service. It was very nervous work, both for the lecturer and many of his hearers, but his voice was clear and carried far, and his earnest, reverent manner impressed the vast congregation from the first moment. To one who for long years had wished that he could have an opportunity of uttering the great truths which were the foundation of his own life, other than that afforded by the Royal Institution, it was a unique moment, and a glance at his quiet, self-possessed face, showed that he was equal to the great task, and stilled all feeling of anxiety.

The next day both the congratulations and vituperations began; the latter made little impression. On his way home Max Müller met Dr. Liddon, who wrung his hand, saying, ‘I rejoice from my heart that you have been helping us.’ The author of The Childhood of Religion wrote:—

‘I must thank you for your noble words in the Abbey last week, to which it was my delight to listen. I am sure they will do great good in directing attention to the place each faith has had in the order of this divinely-governed world.’

TO THE DEAN OF WESTMINSTER.

PARKS END, OXFORD, December 11, 1873.

‘MY DEAR STANLEY,—So the work is done. I hope it may produce some good effect! I may tell you now that I never felt so nervous in my life before, but I had perfect confidence in you, that you would not have asked me unless you felt it ought to be done, and could be done. All the people I see here seem to acquiesce, but of course I have no opportunity of hearing their real opinion. Ruskin was truly pleased, and I believe would like to lecture himself. I wish the University Sermons could be opened to laymen—there seems to be no reason why they should not. Are you aware that in the Greek Church it is by no means unusual for laymen to occupy the pulpit? I read your sermon to-day—I had hardly heard it in the Abbey, I felt so excited. I like it very much. Did you see the new ending to my lecture? I felt there was something wanting to make the ending less abrupt, and as I am not likely to have another opportunity soon, I thought I might as well say all I had to say. Ever yours.

‘I am truly grateful now that you asked me, and glad that I did it.’

TO PROFESSOR KLAUS GROTH.

Translation.

OXFORD, December 14, 1873.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND,—It is long since I wrote. You have no idea how my time goes, and the letters I like to write have to wait for those I must write. I have written to Prince Christian about the Platt-Deutsch Bible: the thing can be done, and I have told him not to consult any one further, but to leave the arrangements entirely to you. One could begin with the New Testament—wait how that succeeds, before the Old Testament is undertaken. Yes, how much has happened again this year, and how little really effected! All has gone well with us. I am often frightened at our happiness. Wife and children well, my mother on a visit to us for the last six months, also far stronger than one dare expect. I certainly was laid up in summer, but am now quite well. I have said farewell to Strassburg with a heavy heart, but I hope wisely. It was not quite what I expected. There was a want of go, of initiative. My idea was that the best powers of Germany would come to this new Byzantium of literature, the Crown Prince at their head, that the Alsatians might be forced to be proud of their country, and that a new mental capital would be founded in Strassburg, as a make-weight to the military metropolis; but the reality, pleasant as it was, was different. Fritz Kraus<sup>1</sup> has thanked me for a notice you wrote on his Southampton Sonnets. Greetings to all our Kiel friends. . . . I hope your Christmas will be one of undisturbed happiness. Your boys must be growing fast. Shall we soon meet? It does not look like it.’

<sup>1</sup> A young Swiss, who made an excellent translation of Shakespeare's Sonnets into German. He was a great invalid, and died of decline in 1881.

TO W. LONGMAN, ESQ.

OXFORD, December 15.

‘“Why is there so much delay about bringing out the Sermons?” the Dean writes to me from Windsor; but it is not my fault. I ordered my part for press on Wednesday. I look forward to three months’ imprisonment with great pleasure. What an amount of work I shall be able to get through, having no dinner-parties, calls, meetings, &c., to interrupt my work!’

Some of the papers had threatened Max Müller with imprisonment for brawling in church, and an Oxford tradesman who had heard of this ran out of his shop one day as he was passing, and, seizing his hand, said, ‘Well, sir, when they send you to prison, count on a hot dinner from my table every week.’

TO HERR GEORGE VON BUNSEN.

December 21.

‘... The theological wasps buzz around my ears. It was an exertion indeed, but it was worth while—fiat experimentum in corpore vili. There is no going to prison just yet, however—Stanley had a legal opinion from the Lord Chief Justice before he undertook the matter.’

Perhaps the attack that amused Max Müller most was from Mr. Henry Reeve, the editor of the Edinburgh Review, who was presumably ignorant of Lord Coleridge’s legal opinion, and wrote, ‘By the law of England, as I read it, an unordained person who preaches or lectures in a church is guilty of a misdemeanour, punishable with three months’ prison, and though Westminster Abbey is so peculiar that it is probable the law could not reach you, I shall always deeply regret that you were induced . . . to appear there!’

TO HERR GEORGE VON BUNSEN.

Translation.

PARKS END, December 25, 1873.

‘Many thanks for your letter, and for all the interesting enclosures from friends. I have been very busy lately. The English people have so much time for writing letters, and to explain oneself to three or four different parties is no easy matter. In spite of all, I am nevertheless glad to have followed Stanley’s bidding. . . . Yes, indeed, I thought of your father when I stood in Westminster Abbey—how often the unlikely becomes reality! I send you my lecture, for first

I had to omit some points when I delivered it, and secondly the Times omitted some things in reporting it.

‘We have had such a happy Christmas; everything was perfect—three generations together—but such happiness fills one with anxiety.

‘Alas, the lectures of Pauli<sup>1</sup> have come to nothing; he was proposed primo loco, but it was impossible to get a majority in his favour. Then we succeeded in obtaining the votes for Goldwin Smith, who is now paying a visit to Oxford; he however, refused.

‘Yes, indeed, the letter from Curtius is very depressing—for the future still more than for the present. And yet it seems unavoidable in Berlin! It is impossible to perform music in a large manufactory. Therefore, I dreamt a dream of Strassburg as a new capital for the new German spirit, but I soon became aware that the wings were wanting, and that they were satisfied with very little.

‘Mommsen told me when I met him in Munich that he was ready to leave Berlin at any moment on his own account, and still more on that of his children. At Leipzig there is no Court and all that belongs to Court life; the merchant class in Leipzig is rich and they are patricians, the Professors are poor but highly esteemed: life there is very agreeable. I often feel drawn towards Leipzig—it might become a new Weimar, only grander and of greater national popularity.’

On the last day of the year Max Müller’s old friend, Professor Gelzer, the author of several theological works in German, wrote to him from Basle:—

Translation.

‘My son gave me at Christmas the first part of your Introduction to the Science of Religion. I began to read it the next evening, and could not stop till I had finished the second half next morning. How I am longing for the continuation! No work for a long time has so electrified me, and edified my deepest soul. There are passages which flashed on me like lightning, for they found an echo of sympathetic agreement in my thoughts.’

The work of the year 1874 was devoted to the sixth and last volume of the Rig-veda. The preparations for the Congress of Orientalists held in London in September, and writing his opening address as President of the Âryan Section, occupied much of Max Müller’s time. His mother returned to Germany in March, but throughout the year the Max Müllers had innumerable guests, among them the reigning Prince and Princess of Roumania.

<sup>1</sup> His friends wished him to give a course of historical lectures at Oxford.

TO HIS WIFE (staying near her old home).

January 8.

‘Our own life is such perfect brightness that I cannot bear the slightest grumble about this or that not being exactly as one likes it. It seems to me so ungrateful to allow one moment to pass that is not full of joy and happiness, and devotion to Him who gives us all this richly to enjoy. The clouds will come, they must come, but they ought never to be of our own making.’

January 12, 1874.

‘By a grave one learns what life really is—that it is not here but elsewhere; that this is the exile, and there is our home. As we grow older the train of life goes faster and faster, those with whom we travelled together step out from station to station, and our own station, too, will soon be reached.’

TO EDWARD TYLOR, ESQ.

January 14.

‘If you have read Whitney’s book, would you not write a review of it for the Academy? I know Whitney is an opponent of mine, or, I should rather say, he hates me, but that does not matter, and if you think that on any point he is right and I am wrong, I shall not be angry if you say so.’

TO HIS WIFE.

April 13, 1874.

‘The spirit of love and the spirit of truth are the two life-springs of our whole being, or, what is the same, of our whole religion, for whatever we are, or do, or feel, or think, is nothing without the keynote of religion. If we lose that bond which holds us and binds us to a higher world, our life becomes purposeless, joyless; if it holds us and supports us, life becomes perfect, all little cares vanish, and we feel we are working out a great purpose as well as we can, a purpose not our own, not selfish, not self-seeking, but in the truest sense of the word God-serving and God-seeking.

‘I shall have more time for my children when the Veda is finished. I now always feel, and have felt for years, that every hour when I could work was due to the Veda, but I shall feel that no more.’

Max Müller had a great pleasure this spring in a visit to Oxford of his old friend Victor Carus, with his wife and daughters. He was on his way to Edinburgh, where he had undertaken a course of lectures.

TO PROFESSOR CARUS.

Translation.

April 28.

‘MY DEAR VICTOR,—Here everything is light and sunny; you ought to have stayed quietly here. It was like old days to have you here. Life spins itself further and further, but the old threads run on through it. The death of Phillips<sup>1</sup> has shocked us all terribly. I was not there, and only heard of the accident the next morning; when I got there he was already dead. There was no suffering, but he died without regaining consciousness. I have just heard from Pauli from Göttingen—always the same. Hearty greetings from us to you all.’

A letter from his old friend and master, Professor Brockhaus, was a great pleasure to him this spring:—

Translation.

May, 1874.

‘I heard with great delight that you have been working very hard to finish your Rig-veda. It is just thirty years since you first announced your resolution to edit this gigantic work, and now the whole is finished before us. With what delight you must look on the past. You have achieved great things, and your services to this, the richest product of the Indian mind, will gain ever increasing recognition and admiration.’

It was in June of this year that Max Müller received a wholly unexpected honour, the Order pour le Mérite, which may be called the Blue Ribbon of Literature. Soon after, when Max Müller was commanded to dine at Windsor, he wrote to Prince Leopold to ask if he might wear his Order, and the wire came back, ‘Not may, but must.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

June 7, 1874.

‘Have you seen in the papers that they have made me a Knight of the Order pour le Mérite? I cannot understand it. There are but twenty for all Germany. The Knights elect themselves, and the King has only to confirm their choice. Now the Berliners are by no means my best friends; on the contrary, I have had from time to time to disagree sharply with several of their celebrities, and I never once thought of their electing me. Well, it is no ordinary Order, and is the only one that a literary man may wear with pleasure, and so I am really pleased, though I should have been quite happy without any Order. I have not heard direct, only what is in the papers, so it may not be true after all. It is the one foreign Order I can wear at Court here without special leave.'

<sup>1</sup> Professor of Geology. He died from falling downstairs at All Souls.

TO PROFESSOR CARUS (who was to receive an honorary D.C.L. degree at Commemoration).

Translation.

'MY DEAR VICTOR,—Come on Tuesday, that you may not be tired but have time to rest. We are counting on your coming to us. Won't you bring your wife or a daughter with you? Two rooms are ready—you know that, and we are rejoicing over this unexpected meeting. As to the Order pour le Mérite, it passes my comprehension. I only know as yet what was in the papers. No one in Berlin has written about it. The Berliners do not love me inordinately, and the election is with the Knights. Well, I shall hear more—till then we must "bear the inevitable with resignation."'

TO PROFESSOR LEPSIUS.

Translation.

PARKS END, June 18.

'MY DEAR AND HONOURABLE FRIEND,—I have not yet got over my shock, but the astonishment gives way to mere joy and gratitude. Never for a moment did I think that this honour would be bestowed upon me after having been away so long from the Fatherland<sup>1</sup>; and I can never be grateful enough to those who have not forgotten me on this occasion. I feel again strongly how my heart is drawing me to Germany, and did I still possess such vitality as you do, I should return there to-morrow. Well my slavery is to stop this year; in September, I hope my last volume of the Rig-veda will be finished, and who knows what will happen then! I shake your hand most heartily to-day. Am I right to send my official thanks to Ranke? . . . What do you think of another trial for a common alphabet at the Congress? Our paths, as I told you before, do not lie far apart; in short, I am satisfied to express the fact of modification, you express the method of modification. My system is the more incomplete, by no means, however, excluding the more complete one. It only needs an understanding about the three degrees of modification; I am only afraid there will be no time for it.'

TO THE CROWN PRINCE.

PARKS END, OXFORD, June 20, 1874.

Translation.

'YOUR IMPERIAL AND ROYAL HIGHNESS,—I am almost afraid that I may appear obtrusive, when I venture to express to your Royal <sup>1</sup> Max Müller was elected one of the twenty German Knights, not as a foreign Knight.

Highness my joy and gratitude at the distinction granted to me by His Majesty the Emperor. But the ardent desire will not give way to conventional constraint, and the reverence which I have had for your Royal Highness for so many years gives me confidence that your Royal Highness will not be offended even should I offend against etiquette.

‘I really cannot imagine to whom I owe my gratitude for the great and unexpected honour. His Majesty the Emperor has given me repeated proofs of his gracious kindness, but this, it seems to me, I can only ascribe to the kind intercession of others. It suddenly occurred to me, that the thought of bestowing this distinction upon me might have received its first impulse from your Royal Highness, and, whether I be right or wrong, I could not rest till I had expressed how deeply grateful I feel for this great distinction, and how it inspires me to new life and work.

‘I do indeed realize just now, how my heart clings with all its fibres to Germany. The work which brought me to England first of all, and which has kept me incessantly occupied here for twenty-five years, the publishing of the Veda, will be finished this summer, and I shall then feel a free man. If I could be of more use in Germany than here, I should like to return to Germany, though I have grown old. I was very happy at Strassburg; it was like an intellectual sea-bath. Only the task appointed me did not seem far-reaching enough. The Alsatians ought to have been made to feel proud of their new Strassburg in spite of themselves, and just one course of lectures did not suffice for that. I had hoped that, as in former times for Bonn, so now for Strassburg, Germany would send her best men, in order to create there a new spiritual Byzantium, a capital of German art, science, and learning. But this was not thought of. Of course I do not mean to assert that the slow and quiet development of circumstances is not perhaps the better one. I soon felt, however, that under these conditions the giving up of my work in England was hardly justified. But now, having finished the work which tied me to England, the old thoughts of home return, and especially the desire to be one of those who fight under the flag of your Royal Highness on the battle-field of the mind. There are sure to be such battles, in fact there are such now, and I am often astonished how little part the people take in the great religious and Church questions of the present time; how the Government seems left to bear all the responsibility, and this makes a healthy and powerful solution of the matter almost an impossibility. And though in England also, material interests absorb a great part of the moral strength, yet in struggles, such as have begun now in Germany, the heart of the whole nation would beat louder and stronger. What good would it do to Germany, to win the whole world and to lose herself, to lose that which has made her great, her earnestness of life, her joy in everything that is truly beautiful, her courage in the search for truth, her faith in something higher than this life? There is much to conquer still, though it may not be Alsace and Lorraine. Great success is exhausting for a while, but it seems time now to think of the future, which, though the past has been great, ought to be still greater.

‘With the best wishes for the great future which awaits your Royal Highness, I remain, your Royal Highness’ obedient servant.’

On July 1 the following entry stands in his wife’s Diary: ‘To-day M. finished the MS. of the Rig-veda.’ The printing had already begun, and was going on apace.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

August 2.

‘To-day I have been made an Honorary Member of the Hungarian Academy. I don’t know how it came about. I, of course, never stirred in the matter, and yet the German literary men are so angry about it. They cannot hide their displeasure, but it does not hurt. The nearer I come to the end of the Veda, the more I find there is to do, but it must be ready for the Oriental Congress in September.

‘To-morrow is our wedding-day: how fast the time goes, and how much sunshine these fifteen years have brought us, even though the clouds have not been wholly wanting. God will help us further.’

TO HIS WIFE (who was at the death-bed of the mother-aunt).

August 19, 1874.

‘The death of those we love is the last lesson we receive in life—the rest we must learn for ourselves. To me, the older I grow and the nearer I feel that to me too the end must be, the more perfect and beautiful all seems to be; one feels surrounded and supported everywhere by power, wisdom, and love, content to trust and wait, incapable of murmuring, very helpless, very weak, yet strong in that very helplessness, because it teaches us to trust to something not ourselves. Yet parting with those we love is hard—only I fear there is nothing else that would have kept our eyes open to what is beyond this life.’

TO M. RENAN.

August 19.

‘MY DEAR FRIEND AND ILLUSTRIOUS COLLEAGUE,—It is such a long time since I had the pleasure of hearing from you, that I cannot allow an opportunity to pass which may I hope bring us together again. You know that from the fourteenth to the twenty-first of September there will be a large gathering of Oriental scholars in London. I always understood that you would be here at the time, if not for the sake of the Congress, at least for a visit to England, which you had planned last year and postponed to this. Now I hope it may be so, and that we may meet not only in London, but also in Oxford. You know that a visit from you and Madame Renan is a very old promise, and both I and my wife have always looked forward to its fulfilment with great pleasure. We shall, of course, be in London during the actual week of the Congress, but afterwards we return to Oxford, and should be delighted to show you all that is interesting and beautiful both here and in the neighbourhood. Please let me hear what your plans are. If you could be persuaded to join the Congress we should of course consider it a great honour, and you would find among the multitude some scholars whom you would like to meet. My old teacher Brockhaus is coming, also Stenzler, Weber, Windisch, Schrader, Lepsius, Brugsch, and many more; even Pundits from India. Now please consider all this, and let me know your decision. I see that your great work on the Phœnician Expedition is finished, and I congratulate you with all my heart. I can share your feelings, for I have just ordered the last sheet of the Rig-veda for press. Twenty-five years of work, and I have now only to print the preface and various readings. The last sheets were printed from copies I had made at Paris, May, 1846, during the bright and happy days when Burnouf lectured at the Collège de France. My wife presents her kind regards to you and Madame Renan, and hopes I shall succeed in persuading you to come. With old and unchanged sentiments of sincere regard.'

In the beginning of September Max Müller had the honour of receiving the reigning Prince and Princess of Roumania under his roof. They wished to see Oxford, and their only free days coincided with some meeting that filled every hotel in Oxford. In a letter to his mother Max Müller speaks of the Princess as very clever, and of the Prince as a man of great courage and determination. 'They have both of them a strong feeling for the duties of their great station, and are full of plans for the good of the people committed to their care.' They met again in London, and a feeling of true esteem and friendship sprang up, which was a source of deep gratification to Max Müller to the last. Only a few days before his death he received the kindest message from the King of Roumania about a little service that he had been able to render to His Majesty.

The Oriental Congress which met in London towards the close of September was a time of great interest and pleasure to Max Müller, who afterwards welcomed to his house in Oxford many old friends—Professor Lepsius and his eldest son, Professor Nöldeke, Dr. Stenzler, Dr. Spiegel, Dr. Gosche, M. Léon Feer, and various distinguished Orientals. The Max Müllers stayed during the Congress with the Kingsleys in their charming old house in the Cloisters at Westminster. Charles Kingsley was in bad health, not having really recovered from the severe illness he had had during his visit to America in the summer. His wife was then perfectly well.

Max Müller was President of the Âryan Section, and in opening the section delivered a striking address on the Importance of Oriental Studies. The Prince of Roumania came up from Hastings to attend it. At the conclusion of the address, Max Müller presented to the Congress the last sheet of the last volume of the Rig-veda, with the Commentary of Sâyanâchârya. His old teacher, Professor Brockhaus, was present to witness the completion of his pupil's great work. The address was published in Chips, Volume IV. An appreciative article on his work had lately appeared in one of the American papers.

‘Professor F. Max Müller is just giving the last touches to his final volume of the Rig-veda. The work was begun twenty-five years ago, and was undertaken as a labour of love, for those who at that period were interested in Oriental or Sanskrit studies were few indeed; too few certainly for the German scholar to have anticipated any reward for his labour, except the gratitude of those few, and the consciousness of having given an important contribution to learning. But within that twenty-five years the interest in such studies has quadrupled at least, and thousands now wish to study the Rig-veda. I believe there has been some disposition among American students of Sanskrit to criticize Max Müller's work in a disparaging way, but the Hindoo scholars themselves declare that it is the best rendering of their ancient hymns which exists, and such is the growing opinion in England. And how much has he done beside? Those who have only read his Chips from a German Workshop, his Science of Religion, his Lectures on Language, know but the half of his labours, which really have embraced the preparation of a complete set of instrumentalities for the prosecution of Sanskrit studies. Everybody who is engaged in any work of that kind rushes to him, and none are turned empty away. At the same time he has mingled in every important discussion bearing on philology and mythology in both England and Germany, generally carrying the verdict for his point, but always knowing how to yield gracefully to argument, and, moreover, always prompt in recognizing discoveries made by others in directions where he himself had looked without making them. In short, Max Müller is among the most truthful and industrious workers of Europe just now, and he has built up a reputation which few possess.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

October 9.

'We have lately been very much occupied, partly with the Oriental Congress, partly by visits to us and visits we have paid. Happily I had finished my Veda, and have only a little to do to the preface, index, &c., which must be finished this week, and then I shall not grudge myself a little freedom. We had Lepsius, father and son, on a visit. Then we went to stay with Mr. Grant Duff, formerly Under-Secretary for India, and with Sir John Lubbock, where we met Darwin, Tyndall, Spencer, and the two Lepsius'. Lectures will soon begin here, and though I have been here through the vacation and worked hard, it has suited me very well. Perhaps I shall take a holiday in winter, if I need it, and a visit to Rome has long been hoped for by us both. My principal work is finished, and I can at last give myself a treat.'

This visit was the only time Max Müller and Darwin met. The conversation turning on apes as the progenitors of man, Max Müller asserted that if speech were left out of consideration, there was a fatal flaw in the line of facts. 'You are a dangerous man,' said Darwin, laughingly.

It was in the November of this year that Bishop Colenso visited Oxford as the guest, first of Max Müller, and then of the Master of Balliol, and was forbidden to preach at Carfax, the City Church, by the Bishop of Oxford.

On November 27 Max Müller writes:—

TO HIS WIFE.

'I sent you a line this afternoon after I had seen Colenso. It seems an unwarrantable stretch of authority on the part of the Bishop, for there is no legal censure of any kind against Colenso. He has simply spoken out and said what every bishop knows or ought to know. I hear there is an attempt to prevent his preaching in Balliol, but in that they will hardly succeed.'

November 29.

'Colenso preached an excellent sermon in Balliol Chapel. He dwelt on the natural slowness of all progress in nature, as well as in the world of spirit; that we ought to learn to wait, and not expect to see the kingdom of God on earth, but only to work for it. The chapel was full—his two sons were there, and the whole scene was very touching. The time will come when they will thank Colenso for having shown that the Old Testament is a genuine old book, full of all the contradictions and impossibilities which we have a right to expect in old books, but which we seldom see in books written on purpose. With those who hold that the Song of Solomon was miraculously inspired one cannot agree—it is with them as with those who defend the real material Presence, they have changed the highest truth into most dangerous falsehood. However, let them fight it out; they will never prevail.'

On the same day Max was able to write to his mother:—

Translation.

'The last volume of the Veda is in the bookbinder's hands—a long piece of work finished. I often hardly believed that I should finish it, but now I feel I have a right to rejoice, and shall often think of it with real delight.'

Many kind congratulations came from old friends who had watched the progress of the work during many years.

The Master of Balliol wrote:—

'I heartily congratulate you on the completion of your great work. I only disagree with one thing in your preface, that you dare to speak of yourself as an old man. We are none of us old until we think that we are.'

TO PROFESSOR ALTHAUS.

Translation.

December 3.

'Many thanks for your letter. Indeed, I had hardly thought it possible that I should be permitted to finish this work, and now that it is finished, something seems to be wanting every day. However, there is plenty of material left for work, and if my strength holds out, the good will to work is never wanting.'

In December Max Müller received the thanks of the Secretary of State for India in Council for the satisfactory manner in which he had carried out the important work entrusted to him. In his reply to Sir Lewis Malet, Max Müller expressed his pleasure that the work was done, and his gratitude to Her Majesty's Government for having enabled him to finish a task which he thought was worth a life, and for which he had received in France, Italy, and Germany the highest honours which a literary man can aspire to.

'The Rig-veda, though for the last 3,000 years it has formed the foundation of the religious life of India, had never before been rendered accessible to the people at large, and its publication will produce, nay, has already produced, in India an effect similar to that which the first printing of the Bible produced on the mind of Europe. Beyond the frontiers of India also, the first edition of the oldest book of the whole Âryan race has not been without its effect, and as long as men value the history of their language, mythology, and religion, I feel confident that this work will hold its place in the permanent library of mankind.'

To Max Müller's surprise and gratification, he received about three months later a letter from Sir Lewis Malet, informing him 'that the Secretary of State for India in Council has sanctioned a grant of money to you, as a special recognition of your services in connexion with the editing and printing of the Rig-veda, in addition to the sum received by you as an honorarium, according to the original agreement.'

Few but Sanskrit scholars will have read the preface to this sixth and last volume of Max Müller's great work, and some passages are therefore given from it:—

'When I had written the last line of the Rig-veda and Sâyana's Commentary, and put down my pen, I felt as if I had parted with an old, old friend. For thirty years scarcely a day has passed on which my thoughts have not dwelt on this work, and for many a day, and many a night too, the old poets of the Veda, and still more their orthodox and painstaking expositor, have been my never-failing companions. I am happy, no doubt, that the work is done, and after having seen so many called away in the midst of their labours, I feel deeply grateful that I have been spared to finish the work of my life. But habits established for so long a time are not broken without a wrench, and even now I begin to miss my daily task; I begin to long for some difficult and corrupt passages to grapple with, for some abrupt quotation, or for some obscure allusion to Pânini to trace back to its original source.

‘It was in 1845, when attending the lectures of Eugène Burnouf, that my thoughts became fixed on an edition of the Rig-veda and its voluminous Commentary. I still see the eager faces of a number of young scholars sitting round the table when Burnouf was lecturing with a vivacity, a keenness, a flow of knowledge, which I have never seen surpassed. . . . I was the youngest of them all, and, though I had published a translation of the Hitopadesa, my ideas of Sanskrit literature did not reach much beyond the Epic Poems and the Upanishads. Nothing, I thought, could in beauty of thought or expression exceed the Upanishads; I had translated some of them for Schelling. Well do I remember my surprise when I heard Burnouf speak of them as works of small importance, compared with the older portions of the Veda. Burnouf was lecturing then on the first book of the Rig-veda. He possessed a complete copy of Sâyana’s Commentary. After a time Burnouf lent me some of his MSS. and encouraged me to copy them. It was hard work at first . . . and, but for his frank acknowledgement that he too could not always make out Sâyana, I should never have had the courage to persevere. . . . But I worked on till a portion of the work was finished, and after obtaining the patronage of the old East India Company, I was able to publish the first volume in 1849.

‘We are now in 1874. Twenty-five years are certainly a long time, and when I saw how some of my friends clamoured at the delay . . . I began to fear I might really be to blame. I therefore made out an account of my stewardship, and the result was as follows : I found that since 1849 there were three years in which I was prevented going on with my work—one year when I was out of health, another when I had to wait for the renewal of the grant, on the extinction of the East India Company, and a third when waiting for a MS. from India, which promised to be if not the original, yet much more ancient than any I had used. During the last twenty-five years I have done other work also. . . . I have not thought that a man ought to live by Sanskrit alone. But after deducting the three years when I could not print, I found to my own surprise that I had published in my two editions of the Rig-veda, the large one with, and the small one without Sâyana’s Commentary, what amounted to an annual volume of nearly 600 pages octavo, during twenty-five consecutive years. If my friends will also take into account that in that time I published two editions of my History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, two editions of my Sanskrit Grammar, the Prâtisâkhya, text, translation and notes, and the first volume of my translation of the Rig-veda, I think they will admit that I have not been altogether faithless to my first love.'

If we add to this the Lectures on the Science of Language, and innumerable lectures and essays on language, mythology, and religion republished in the Chips, the total record of work done is not a light one for a man not yet fifty-one!

Max Müller concludes his preface by a few lines in self-defence, which will find an echo in the hearts of most authors :

'I know I have sometimes been blamed for not replying to my critics, but such blame was most unjust. The fact is that I could not possibly do it. When books are reviewed as they now are, not only in England, but in every country in Europe, nay, even in America and India, what are we to do? Many of these reviews never reach me at all, but even if I attempted to read and notice those only which I happen to see, I should have had no time left for anything else. It was not want of respect that made me silent, but simply want of time. I venture to avail myself of this opportunity to explain another apparent neglect on my part, for which I know I have been blamed, if not in public, at least in private. During the last ten years, the number of books sent me from all parts of the world has become so great that I had to give up the attempt to acknowledge them all. When I was a young man it was generally understood that no acknowledgement was expected when a book was sent without a letter; to that rule I have conformed both as a sender and receiver of presentation copies. It is generally said that Humboldt acknowledged all books and answered all letters. . . . Humboldt died before the Penny Post attained its full development. . . . I feel sure that my friends will forgive me if I do not always write, by return of post, that I am looking forward with the greatest pleasure to reading their books. Nothing gives me greater pleasure than reading books written by men with whom I am personally acquainted, but if a friend sends me a book on Comparative Mythology while I am in the midst of work on Sanskrit accentuation, I must put his work aside for a time, and cannot express an opinion till I find leisure to read it carefully. Soyez raisonnables.'

Here it is necessary to revert to an extraordinary statement published soon after Max Müller's death in the New York Nation, and repeated in other journals. The Nation says: 'What Max Müller constantly proclaimed to be his own great work, the edition of the Rig-veda, was in reality not his at all. . . . A German scholar did the work, and Müller appropriated the credit for it. But even in this case, though the judgement be true, it is harsh. The German scholar was paid for his labour, and did the best he could to circumvent Müller in getting out his editio prima. The incident is not altogether creditable to either party.' To those who have read thus far in the Life of Max Müller, it will seem almost impossible that a respectable paper could publish so false a statement. Burnouf, Brockhaus, Cowell, and many other Nestors of Sanskrit scholarship watched from 1846 with deep interest the progress of the work, and knew from seeing it how Max Müller had spent years in copying and collating MSS. of the Rig-veda, and searching out obscure references in Sâyana's Commentary. The German scholar alluded to is Dr. Aufrecht, for many years Professor of Sanskrit in Edinburgh, and then in Bonn. The passage in the Nation is as insulting to him as to Max Müller. Dr. Aufrecht would be the first to acknowledge that the first volume of the Rig-veda (the most difficult of all, says Mr. Macdonell, the present excellent Professor of Sanskrit at Oxford) had been published three years before he and Max Müller ever met, and that when he arrived in England to work under Max Müller the second volume was already nearly finished. In the prefaces to the second, third, and fourth volumes Max Müller fully acknowledges his indebtedness to Dr. Aufrecht. For the last two volumes he had the assistance of other younger scholars, and in the prefaces to these volumes he mentions this, and in Volume VI gives the names of Dr. Eggeling, now Professor of Sanskrit at Edinburgh, and Dr. Thibaut, Professor of Sanskrit at Benares, as his helpers. Dr. Kielhorn, Professor of Sanskrit at Göttingen, writes: 'While I was in Oxford (from 1862-65) . . . I have often seen Max Müller at work on the Rig-veda, and had occasion to consult the index to the text, which he had compiled many years before.' Dr. Eggeling writes: 'From what I saw personally of Max Müller's mode of working, I may say that I always admired the extremely careful and scholarly way in which he dealt with his manuscript materials in constituting his final text.' M. Barthe, writing in April, 1874, says: 'M. Max Müller is, and must always remain, the first editor of the Rig-veda. He was the one man in Europe who had courage enough to enter on this path. It was he who took up the work as it fell from the failing hands of Rosen, and who, extending the design of Rosen, conceived it as worthy to be the principal work of his own life.' Professor Macdonell, after a careful examination, calculates that, if Professor Aufrecht had worked absolutely alone at Volumes III and IV, and the end of Volume II, collecting and collating all MSS., &c., he would have done but little over one-third of the work, of which all is ascribed to him in the article imposed (no doubt) on the Nation. Had there been any truth in the accusation its discovery would not have been left to an anonymous accuser in America, nor its exposure reserved until after Max Müller's death.

A great anxiety fell on the Max Müllers towards the close of the year. Mrs. Kingsley became alarmingly ill, and no hope was given that her life would be spared. Max Müller wrote to his mother:—

December 12.

'I meant to write to you to-morrow (Sunday), but a sad duty calls us away. Mrs. Kingsley is very ill, the doctors have given her up, and as she wishes to see G. once again, we shall start very early to-morrow morning for Eversley, and return in the evening. It is a heart disease which has come on suddenly. She herself considers her state as hopeless, so do her husband and children, yet they write with a quiet resignation that astonishes one. There has never been a happier family life, and this sudden end is terrible. It will be a trying day, and I could not let G. go alone. We have not been there together since we spent the first week of our honeymoon there.'

TO THE SAME.

December 27.

'We went to Eversley. Mrs. Kingsley spoke quietly to G. about everything, and asked me to play something. Her husband and children were so quiet and self-possessed. I have never seen anything like it. She is a little better, but she might die at any moment. They have had such a happy life together, and it was heart-breaking to see it all.'

As they left Charles Kingsley said to them, 'When I am left alone you will come to me.' His wife lived on, but in little more than a month the Max Müllers returned to Eversley for his funeral.

CHAPTER XXI

1875

Death of Charles Kingsley. Visit to Italy. Windsor. Last visit of mother. Chips, Volume IV. The Mumbles. Manchester. Plans for return to Germany. Maximilian Order. Oxford Girls' High School.

FROM the moment that he had written the last line of the last volume of the Rig-veda, Max Müller's thoughts again turned longingly to his own country: though he fully realized how hard it would be to break the ties of twenty-seven years that bound him to Oxford, and he also found it very difficult to decide whether England or Germany would offer the best opening for his son, who was then only eight years old. Yet on account of his education it was necessary to come soon to a decision. As he said in one of his letters at this time, he 'waited for some intimation.'

TO PROFESSOR TIELE OF LEYDEN.

Translation.

January 3, 1875.

'DEAR FRIEND,—I should have liked to write to you ere this to thank you for your kind letter and for the essays on the science of language, but my hands were so full that I put off everything which was not absolutely necessary. Shortly after receiving your essay, I got another from Darwin filis, inspired, however, by Darwin père, which had to be answered by return. It had to be written and printed in a week, an excuse for the many printer's mistakes. I sent you a copy to-day, in which I refer to your essay. It was an opportunity of bringing to light the affair of Whitney & Co., though I detest this sort of thing. I had never before seen the Whitney lectures, and I must confess my astonishment that such a work has been pushed into the foreground by personal efforts. The man takes my lectures, lectures on them and out of them, and then publishes them, and to prove his own originality kicks me. Voilà tout! I do not find one single thought in the whole book which is original.

Well, I am little disturbed or troubled by this sort of thing, and without Mr. George Darwin's attack, I should have taken no notice of the book at all. I read the other day that Schiller, when he published the Horen, ordered and paid for twelve reviews in the Jena Journal für Litteratur. Can such things happen still?

'The serious evil of the tendency of Philosophy and Religion in the present day is that it so neglects the historical side. All feeling for the past is gone, and we have to lend our ear to things which Plato would not have ventured to make his adversaries utter. The more rude, the more original, is everybody's view now. And nothing can be done; we have to work for the few, not for the many; in the end we work best for ourselves alone, leaving the success to circumstances. If we only succeed in finding sufficient competent judges who take an interest in our doings and strivings, we can rest satisfied. I feel convinced that we shall live to see a change and a return to thoroughness in work. I long for Italy, which I have never really seen. My mother is still living at Chemnitz: she did not like England, her lively spirit missed the social intercourse. I hope I may see her this summer.'

TO CHARLES DARWIN, ESQ.

TAPLOW, January 7.

'I hope in the course of the year to be able to place my whole argument before you. Even if I cannot hope to convince you, I trust at least to be able to show you that there are difficulties connected with the origin of language which deserve careful consideration, which possibly to me may seem greater than to you, but which, I feel sure, you would be the last person to wish to ignore. I can assure you I feel, as strongly as any mere layman in natural history can feel it, the impulsive force of your arguments. If I hesitate in following you in your explanation of the last animal metamorphosis, it is not because I am afraid, but simply because I see certain elements in human nature which would remain unexplained. To ordinary observers these elements may seem infinitesimally small and hardly worth a thought; but you know how the infinitesimally small is, after all, what is really important in evolution. You know better than anybody how infinitely great is the difference between man and animal: what I want to know is the first small and hardly perceptible cause of that difference, and I believe I find it in language and what is implied by language.'

During the winter of 1874-5, Prince Leopold had a severe attack of typhoid fever, which called forth the following letter:—

TO ROBERT COLLINS, ESQ.

PARKS END, January 22, 1875.

‘Many a time have I taken the pen to write to you, and always put it down again, fearing that I was only taking up your time, every minute of which must now be so precious. Yet I hope it is not very selfish if I ask you to tell the Prince how deeply I feel for him in his heavy trials, and how I hope and trust that he may soon recover his health. I know how you must be suffering, seeing the Prince suffer so much, he who with his brightness and kindness towards everybody might have enjoyed life so much, and been a source of joy to all around him. I know your strong feelings for the Prince, and I can fully understand them. It was often difficult to remember that he was a young Prince, when one wished to show him how much one appreciated his fine qualities, his power of endurance, his frankness, his uprightness, his sympathy with all that was noble and good, how one really admired him and loved him. Discouraging as the accounts are, it is always right to hope, and I hope most earnestly that our worst fears may not come true.

‘I was with the Kingsleys a few weeks ago to say good-bye. I am afraid, while I am writing, he has left us, and she will follow soon. That bright Vicarage of Eversley, where I spent my honeymoon and which I had not seen since, looked very sad when I saw it last, yet what a blessing to be called away together.’

The sad anticipations expressed in the end of this letter to Mr. Collins proved but too true with regard to Charles Kingsley, and the Max Müllers were among the crowd of mourners who attended his funeral. Max Müller has described that solemn and striking scene in his preface to the new edition of Charles Kingsley’s Roman and Teuton.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

January 29, 1875.

‘Yesterday I was at Eversley for Kingsley’s funeral. It was a very trying day. G. stayed there to help her aunt and the two daughters. Kingsley’s was a loving, noble nature, and the feeling for him is very strong. The Queen wrote Mrs. Kingsley a very beautiful autograph letter; the Prince of Wales was represented by an equerry. Stanley read the service. The poor wife never saw her husband again. She is herself very ill of heart disease, and may die at any moment! The composure of the wife and daughters astonishes one: I am only afraid the worst is to come. He is a great loss to me; he has always been a very true friend, and, long as I have known him, we never had a misunderstanding.'

TO HIS WIFE (at Eversley).

OXFORD, January 30.

'All one's thoughts dwell on that grave at Eversley, and on the desolate house near it. If we miss him, how must they feel without his inspiring presence, his constant care and love for all around him! One never thought of anything but life when one saw him and talked to him, for even in his illness there was no diminution in his vigorous activity. It is strange how little we all think of death as the condition of all the happiness which we here enjoy. If we would but learn to value each hour of life, to enjoy it fully, to use it fully, never to spoil a minute by selfishness, then death would never come too soon; it is the wasted hours which are like death in life, and which make life really so short. He was always himself, his very best self. I never heard him say an unkind word, though I have seen him provoked and worried. It is not too late even now to learn from him, to try to be more humble, more forbearing, more courteous, or, what is at the root of all, more loving, for that seemed to me the real secret of his noble life. And how he conquered! Those who would not be present at his marriage were proud to be at his funeral.'

The death of Charles Kingsley left a gap to Max Müller and his wife which was never filled up. The mutual affection had been strong and deep, and though their busy lives kept them from meeting often, the feeling of warm affection never lessened. Max Müller at this time was so entirely overdone and overworked that his doctor ordered complete change, and he resolved to go to Rome, which had been his dream from boyhood.

TO THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

OXFORD, January 29, 1875.

'I should have answered your Grace's letter before, but my thoughts have been of late absorbed by Kingsley's illness and death. I went to his funeral yesterday: it was beautiful—just as he would have wished it. All classes were represented—he knew no classes, and was loved by all. There were his parishioners young and old, soldiers, gipsies, huntsmen and the hounds, officers, deans, bishops, the representative of the Prince of Wales, and many of his old friends. His face in death was sublime: I never saw such a change; all the struggle and worry of his face were gone, and there one saw the perfect, massive features as nature had intended them. There is another light gone out—life darker and poorer—and if one looks round, one sees no one to take his place.

‘I am glad to hear that you are preparing for another battle. The question of development must be argued out. I only wish it could be argued without those constant appeals ad populum. I confess I am by no means clear in my own mind. There seem to be development and degradation running side by side wherever we touch the history of the world, and what seems improvement from one point of view seems degradation from another. Thus polytheism is an improvement on monotheism, or, as I call it, Henotheism, as long as monotheism represents only a belief in one god, not in the One God. The belief in one god which has not yet passed through the negation of other gods, is as it were a belief in one accidental god, and compared with it, polytheism, or a belief in many single gods, is richer, fuller, more perfect, as enabling man to feel a Divine presence in more and more manifestations, and at last, everywhere. From that last stage the transition into real monotheism is natural, almost inevitable. Now in one sense, Henotheism may seem more perfect than polytheism, for it does not purposely exclude monotheism—monotheism is contained in it, but the One God is not conceived distinctly, till the idea of one god has passed through two negations.

‘I look upon primeval revelation as a figment of scholastic theologians, which falls to pieces as soon as we try to grasp and define it. The first suspicion of a something beyond what we see, was the first revelation, and that revelation is continued to the present day, and, we trust, growing more perfect. What I meant by saying that 3,000 years before Agamemnon our forefathers worshipped a Heavenly Father, was this. The name Dyaus pita, Zeus πατήρ, Jupiter, Tiu-s, occurs in four of the Âryan languages. Therefore it must have existed before Sanskrit was Sanskrit and Greek Greek. The oldest literary Sanskrit carries us back to 1,500 B. C., and it is then so different from Greek that no Greek would have recognized any similarity between his language and that of the Veda. I do not think 2,000 or 3,000 years too much to explain that differentiation; the changes are far greater than those which have taken place in 3,000 years between Vedic Sanskrit and Bengali. However, I generally abstain from expressing linguistic time in definite figures, and I cannot recollect the passage where I said 3,000 before Agamemnon.

‘I should not say that the worship of Dyaus pita excluded polytheism—the very idea of father led to that of a mother, and so we find in the Veda, Prithivî Mata, Earth, the Mother, and Agni, fire, the brother of man.

‘I know of no religious expression among the Âryans older than Dyaus pita.’

TO THE SAME.

OXFORD, February 4, 1875.

‘The earliest known religious form of the Âryan race is, as nearly as possible, a pure monotheism—yes, that is perfectly true. But it was an undoubting monotheism, in one sense perhaps the happiest monotheism—yet not safe against doubts and negation. Doubt and negation followed, it may be by necessity, and the unconscious, defenceless monotheism gave way to polytheism. That religious form, however, contained within itself the germs of future growth, and by a new negation the polytheistic form gave way again to conscious, determined monotheism. Now, in one sense, the first childlike monotheism may seem more perfect than the second, and polytheism may be treated as a mere degradation. But from another and, it seems to me, a more historical point of view, polytheism makes an advance on unconscious monotheism, because through it alone does man reach the higher monotheism which definitely excludes a return to polytheism.

‘Before the earliest expression given by the Âryan nation to their belief in a Heaven-Father, there is no doubt an endless vista of earlier stages. Such words as Dyaus pita are like tertiary and metamorphic rocks—we can read in them a long history; but, however far back we may follow the history of linguistic and mental growth among the Âryan nations, nowhere is there any trace, as far as I can see, of what is vaguely called fetichism. It may have been there, but as yet there is no trace of it.

‘Among the Jews, I doubt whether the Book of Job, as we have it, is older than the Pentateuch. The arguments on either side are very weak, however. It is possible that the Assyrian monuments may give us earlier phases of Semitic religious thought; but I think it is wise, for the present at least, to wait.

‘In religion, as in language and other intellectual manifestations, what is really important is the germ, not the fruit. “A suspicion of something beyond what is seen,” springing naturally from a healthy mind, would be far more important in the early ages of mankind than a ready-made catechism. Man has to gain not only his daily bread, but, what is far more important, his thoughts, his words, his faith, in the sweat of his brow. In that sense, I am a thorough Darwinian. Where I differ from Darwin is when he does not see that nothing can become actual but what was potential; that mere environment explains nothing, because what surrounds and determines is as much given as what is surrounded and determined; that both presuppose each other and are meant for each other. Now I take my stand against Darwin on language, because language is the necessary condition of every other mental activity, religion not excluded, and I am able to prove that this indispensable condition of all mental growth is entirely absent in animals. This is my palpable argument.

‘There is, however, another argument, based on the nature of all known languages, viz. that they presuppose the faculty of numbering, an argument somewhat Pythagorean, but not therefore the less true.

‘Even if it could be proved that man was the lineal descendant of an ape, that would not upset my argument. The ape who could become the ancestor of man, would be a totally different being from the ape that remained for ever the ancestor of apes. That ape would be simply an embryonic man, and we have no ground to be very proud of our own embryonic phases. Yet I quite agree that I see no evidence whatever to force us to admit as real and historical what Darwin has simply proved to be possible and convenient. That man, under all circumstances, was a special creation, we see with our eyes, for every day man is a special creation, different from all other creatures. I grant also that in one sense man may, from the first, have had an intuition or a recollection of the existence of his Maker—but potentia only—like every child that is born into this world, never actually, till that intuition could be expressed in words, and such words as maker or existence are very, very late. We ourselves are still satisfied with the word father, as applied to the Deity, yet almost everything that is implied by father must be taken out, before the word is fit to convey what we wish it to convey. We mean at least father, but we can say no more.

‘I look upon the account of Creation as given in Genesis as simply historical, as showing the highest expression that could be given by the Jews at that early time to their conception of the beginning of the world. We have learnt, certainly since Kant, that the knowledge of beginnings is denied to us, that all we can do is to grope back a little way, and then to trust. I think I have a right to accept a special beginning of man, because I cannot account for what he is, if I look upon him as the product of anything else known to me. I require no more a leap for him than for any other creature; I accept him at what I find him from the first dawn of history to the present day. I have no feeling for or against Darwinism, and I always try in approaching these problems to care for nothing that I may care for in my heart. I am certain that we are led; I am certain we ought to follow; I am certain that, even if we go wrong, as long as we do it because we will not resist the power of facts and arguments, we are right. If Darwin’s facts were irresistible, I should accept the ape-theory without a murmur, because I should feel that we were meant to accept it. But I feel with you that never was a theory of such importance put forward with a smaller array of powerful arguments than by Darwin. "What is, is best:" these were Kingsley's last words, used no doubt in a purely ethical sense, but applicable nevertheless to all pursuit of truth.'

TO PROFESSOR LEPSIUS.

Translation.

PARKS END, February 13.

'...I think of going to Rome with my wife on February 23. The doctor prescribes warm air and rest, and so I intend to carry out a long-cherished wish and to convince myself that Rome really exists. I hope the Congress in London has made you feel none the worse; it was too delightful to meet again the dear old well-known faces. Here the whole thing has certainly made a good impression. You will have seen in the papers the death of Charles Kingsley—another cable snapped that tied me here. I was with him a short time before his death. "What is, is best," were his last words to me! And that is an English clergyman! Why have we, in spite of all the great learning, no such men in the Church in Germany?'

Before leaving home, Max Müller was much amused at being asked by Pelligrini to give him an interview, and allow his cartoon to appear in Vanity Fair. The day was fixed, and the artist arrived; the conversation during and after luncheon was most brilliant, Pelligrini apparently taking no notes, mental or otherwise, of his host. The next week the admirable cartoon appeared, far less of a caricature than many of his weekly victims, and Jehu Junior's notice was very amusing:—

'Never was there a man with so many learned titles or with so good a claim to them as Max Müller. He is a glorified Dryasdust of the most successful kind. He is the one man who knows everything about every language. He has written libraries, and in order to do so has achieved work which would do credit to Universities. Most of his books are of that high order which nobody will read and most people will never hear of; yet he is known to the many, and indeed is one of the few of those who have trodden the higher and more thorny paths of science whose names command respect even from the vulgar.'

The following letter is not only the first of a long correspondence with Dr. Legge, afterwards Professor of Chinese in Oxford, but contains the first reference to Max Müller's scheme of translations of the Sacred Books of the East, which was eventually carried out at the expense of the University of Oxford and the Indian Government.

TO REV. DR. LEGGE.

OXFORD, February 13, 1875.

'It would be the greatest pleasure to me to make your personal acquaintance. I have long wished for an opportunity of being introduced to you, and being able to tell you how much I admire your magnificent edition of the Chinese Classics.

'As to the soundness of your work, I have, of course, no right to express an opinion, but I knew when I heard my old friend Stanislas Julien speak of your work in the highest terms, that it must, indeed, be of the highest order to extort such praise from a man not very lavish of praise.

'All I can say for myself is that I wish we had such translations as yours of the other sacred writings of the world.

'I am trying very hard to get a number of scholars together for a translation of these works, but the task is no easy one.'

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

February 14.

'So I am really going to Rome! In a week I shall give my last lecture, and then we shall start. Of course, till then I have a good deal to do, and I can hardly realize that at my age I shall really see Rome. We shall be away March and April, and, if all goes well, it will be a delightful journey, full of enjoyment. I really want a change, for I have worked very hard lately, and shall see how the dolce far niente suits me. I have felt Kingsley's death deeply. He was such a strong man, so full of life, and so really attached to me; and even in his last days he said that we (that is, G. and I) were the dearest to him, after wife and children. So many feel the great loss he is.'

TO THE SAME.

Translation.

February 20.

'We want to see all quietly, and the best of everything; not all the galleries, just to say we have seen them. We already have invitations in Italy from cardinals and dukes down to Garibaldi, but shall not pay any visits of an evening, but rest quietly on the sofa and sleep. A couple of days at Albani and Frascati were better than statues in the Vatican. I am getting too old for that, but never for beautiful nature.

‘I have not yet presented the Veda to the Queen, for she is still at Osborne. It must wait now till I return.’

Unfortunately Max Müller was really too much overworked when he left England to enjoy Italy as much as he expected. The journey out by Pisa, Siena, and Orvieto, was full of delight, in spite of the constant rain; but hardly had he reached Rome, than he fell ill and was in his room for several days. In spite of this, he managed to see a good deal, but at the cost of great fatigue.

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

NAPLES, March 13.

‘We arrived here yesterday. Rome was too much for me. I had no rest. The papers mentioned my name, and one visit followed another. Then the multitude of things new and old to be seen. I could get no sleep. At last the University wanted to give me a banquet, so I settled to come here first for a fortnight’s rest, and return to Rome after Easter. We have already seen a great deal, and people were most kind, sending me cards to see things that are generally closed. In the Chambers I made acquaintance with Bonghi, the Minister of Public Instruction, and Sella, Minister of Finance. But I was longing for rest, for my journey was to be a refreshment; instead of that, it was a great effort. Here we are settled at the Hôtel d’Angleterre, in the centre of the bay, with wonderful views over the sea. The camellias are in bloom in the open air, and the leaves are coming out on the trees. The oranges hang on the orange-trees wherever one looks; the weather is mild, not too warm, just what one wants for travelling. We have good accounts of the children, and all would be perfect if we had more rest. One forms exaggerated expectations of Rome, because one has read so much about it, and it is after all unique in its interest. St. Peter’s, St. Paul’s outside the walls, Sta. Maria Maggiore, impress one immensely; then the old town, with its columns and triumphal arches, just as it was 2,000 years ago. We left the environs till our return, as the season is rather late. We think of staying about here for a fortnight.’

TO PROFESSOR LEPSIUS.

Translation.

NAPLES, April 1.

‘... In spite of disagreeable interruptions through illness, we enjoy Italy to the full. For me it is all a new world; it comes just a little too late, it only remains pure enjoyment, which it is impossible to make use of for anything any more. That makes me think of something.

The best collaborators for the translation of the Sacred Writings of Mankind, which I have in view, are Germans, so the translations would have to be translated into English. Would not such a work—German—be an undertaking worthy of the Leibniz-Academy? Do think it over: the funds would be of no great importance, and it would sell. The English translation might in that case follow the German original translation. The thought struck me the other day in Sorrento, when I was ill in bed. I should like to hear from you what you think of it; but, as I have already entered into communication with Longmans, I shall have to take a definitive step on my return home.'

On Max Müller's return to Rome, he seemed so much stronger that he fully hoped to be able to attend the banquet which the University wished to give in his honour. But it had to be given up, as he fell ill again. He received the greatest kindness in his illness, the Ministers Bonghi and Sella sitting with him constantly, and a German friend, Baron Hoffmann, owner of the lovely Villa Mattei, brought him fruit and flowers daily. As soon as possible he moved on to Perugia, and thence to Florence. In Florence another banquet was proposed, but gratefully declined. But the students would not be defrauded of seeing the great Âchârya, and so he attended Count de Gubernatis' Sanskrit lecture, when he tells his mother, 'as I entered they all stood up and clapped till I felt quite confused.' One evening he was invited by Count and Countess de Gubernatis to their house. The staircase and entrance were lined by all the students of the Oriental faculty, and he was presented with an album of photographs of the leading Italian Orientalists, with a beautiful portrait of Galileo on the cover, in water-colours. The head student made a suitable speech, to which Max Müller had to reply in French on the spur of the moment.

TO PROFESSOR KLAUS GROTH.

Translation.

FLORENCE, April 17, 1875.

'MY DEAR OLD FRIEND,—How often have I wanted to write to you, first in England, then in Italy! I am ashamed, and yet I am not ashamed, for you are one of the few whom I understand, even when I am silent, and I know that you mistrust my silence as little as I should mistrust yours. In most things we are just as we were, and there is not much news to tell you. Last year I worked like a horse to finish my Veda, which I have done, thank God, but not without mental and physical fatigue, which would not pass off till my doctor ordered me change of air, which I understood as a journey to Italy. We started the end of February, went along the Corniche to Genoa, then to Pisa, Siena, and Orvieto—which are beautiful. The poems that men can build with a few stones are even more wonderful than the poems built of letters and words. Then we went to Rome. You know how travellers exaggerate, and fill our heads with ideas which we then finish painting. But the worst is that with Rome, in spite of all that, and in spite of certain disillusiones, the city amazes one, enchants one, and will not let one go. Its age does not affect me. I am accustomed to greater antiquity in India; the classics no longer make the impression they did thirty years ago; the glories of the Papacy and the Roman Church have no existence for me; but, in spite of all that, the historical reality that the eye sees in every corner satisfies one—the real Forum, the real Arch of Constantine, the real Grave of the Scipios, the real road by which St. Paul approached Rome: and so it goes on, and it strengthens one. In Rome my misfortunes began. I was ill, had to leave, went to Naples—but there I was worse, and to get better went to La Cava, Amalfi, Salerno, Sorrento; it was exquisite, but the power of enjoyment was lacking. My wife took the greatest care of me, and we found a good English doctor. When I was fully recovered, we went again to Rome for a fortnight, and I was hardly three days there before a gastric fever seized me, and I was a prisoner to my room nearly all the time. What is Tantalus compared to this? At last I got over it, and when I had seen the most necessary things, we started home by Perugia, Assisi, and Florence. I shall meet my old mother in Cologne, and take her to Oxford. We have had good news of the children all the time, and shall rejoice when we are with them again. What are your plans, and shall we not soon meet? . . . I send you some letters of Schiller's, which will interest you. I have received some more lately, and think of making them into a pamphlet. Unfortunately I could not get the originals. I have begged to see the originals, and hope to get them. For the rest, all goes on quietly.'

TO PROFESSOR ROLLESTON.

FLORENCE, April 24, 1875.

'Oxford has been, and is still, in a state of hibernation; I expect nothing for some years to come. It will wake after a time, but I doubt whether much is gained by disturbing its slumbers for the present. My only comfort at Oxford is that one can work on quietly there, without anybody taking the slightest notice of one. In all other respects I feel that one is perfectly useless there—in fact, that there is less of a real University and University life than there was when I first came, twenty-five years ago. However, the pendulum will swing back, and there is plenty of good material ready among the young men for having again a real University at Oxford; not simply a machine for shooting the examinations, but a machine for getting the world on a step further. Italy is hard at work both in primary and secondary education; the difficulty is the South, which has almost discouraged the North. Priestly rule has done fearful mischief, and I do not know whether it has left more of ignorance and superstition, or of downright recklessness and atheism. However, there is a good heaven at work, and the bad will go down, I believe.

‘We have enjoyed our journey, except that I have lost much time by illness—gastric fever. I am better now, and we hope to be back the first week in May.’

TO DEAN STANLEY.

OXFORD, May 13.

‘Our happy flight to Italy is over. I am decidedly better, and a good dose of quiet home-life will soon set me up, I hope. I brought my old mother with me from Germany, so that our little house is full. The last friend of yours we saw was the Duke of Sermoneta. I could not see him at Rome, as I was not up to paying visits, but we met at Florence, where he is staying, and soon to be married to Miss Ellis. He is a delightful man, all the more attractive on account of his helplessness. We also met the Count and Countess of Lingen (Crown Prince and Princess) at Florence, working hard from morning till night—a perfect pair of noble creatures. They spoke much of you. I sat at dinner by Madame Minghetti; do you know her? a most attractive grandmother. In spite of my being confined to my room and unable to go out much, I saw much of the Italians and of the leading statesmen, Sella being evidently their strongest man. Italy is working hard; one can hardly trust one’s eyes when one sees Rome without monks and monkeries. They have learnt the German secret, and I expect their schools in a little time will beat the German schools. Soldiers who cannot read and write have to serve four years; those who can, three years only. Imagine how that tells on the village schools! The inheritance of priestly rule is fearful: superstition and open atheism divide the population. Love of their country is their chief ennobling power at present. One feels hopeful about Italy; the North will strengthen the South, the South soften the North. That a nation could have lived through such governments as the Papal, the Neapolitan, and the Austrian, shows what there is in it, and what it may grow into with fresh air and light.

‘I was quite overwhelmed with the reception they gave me in the different Universities—banquets, deputations, presents from the students—only I was not up to any efforts of speech-making and eating and drinking, and had to promise to come again. I think one might exchange Oxford for Florence; it combines all the charms of Italy with the bracing air of England. Anyhow, as soon as I can, I shall go there again.

‘I wanted to ask your advice. At the time of the extinction of the East India Company, the Queen accepted the dedication of my edition of the Rig-veda. The work is now finished, and I should like to present the last volume to the Queen. It is the work of a whole life, at least of thirty years, and I doubt whether there is much life left for hard work now. Whom should I apply to? I have a great dislike to Chamberlains et hoc genus omne, and yet I should like the Queen to know that I have now fulfilled the task which brought me to England in 1846! On my return to England I found a letter that Lord Salisbury had proposed that a further grant should be paid to me in recognition of my services in editing the Rig-veda. I had no right to expect anything of the kind, and I was very much pleased, particularly as it came from him.

‘I have many things I want to talk about with you; when shall we meet? At present I am tunnelling through a whole Mont Cenis of letters and books; oh that my enemies only would write books, and not my friends, who all expect an acknowledgement!’

The following shows the feeling with which the Rig-veda was received by enlightened Hindus:—

FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE ADI BRAHMO SOMÂJ.

CALCUTTA, May 28, 1875.

‘SIR,—Allow me to convey to you the best and most sincere thanks of the Committee of the Adi Brahmo Somâj for your very kind present of your edition of the Rig-veda, the sixth volume of which they received the other day. They cannot express to you their sense of the value of your magnificent present.

‘The Committee further beg to offer you their hearty congratulations on the completion of the gigantic task which has occupied you for the last quarter of a century. By publishing the Rig-veda at a time when Vedic learning has, by some sad fatality, become almost extinct in the land of its birth, you have conferred a boon upon us Hindus, for which we cannot but be eternally grateful.’

The following letter is an acknowledgement of a curious old copy of Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World, from Charles Kingsley's library :—

TO MRS. KINGSLEY.

OXFORD, June 25, 1875.

‘MY DEAREST AUNT,—Many thanks for the books you sent me. I was very glad to have them, for they are very curious, and then they will always remind me of our dear friend. How often I think of him, though, and of you too. But words break down, and tears are idle tears; what can we do but be silent and trust? After all, life, even the longest, is but a short absence, and we must all learn to wait. Yet I do miss him very much. I cannot brook his loss. I can see no why and wherefore, and we always want something of the kind, whether rightly or wrongly, to settle our mind. With all his illness he was so stout of heart, so full of plans, so happy in his new position. I felt always happy when I thought of him, and now, when my thoughts go their daily round, I often start and say to myself, Ah, why is he gone? There is another cable cut which kept me to England, and I often think I had better return to my own country, for nearly all my old friends are gone. However, our home here is so bright and happy, one shrinks from touching it. We are here three generations living together, my mother, G., and the children—all well, all grateful for every day that comes. You know what such a home is—a blessing that makes us tremble. I shall have to go to Windsor on Monday to see the Queen. I know of whom she will speak to me, and I mean to tell her that she has inherited the royal gift of healing wounds, not by a touch of her royal hand, but by a touch of her own royal heart. I may say so, may I not?’

On June 28 Max Müller was summoned to Windsor to dine and sleep, and present his last volume of the Rig-veda to Her Majesty in person. It was on this occasion that he left his luggage behind at Oxford, as described so amusingly in Auld Lang Syne.

TO HIS WIFE.

WINDSOR CASTLE, June 29.

‘Nothing could be kinder than the Queen. She spoke in German, and most beautifully. I had to tell her something about the Veda. Then she spoke with deep feeling of Kingsley, and inquired about her and the children. Then we had some conversation about schools and education in Germany and England, and lastly about Tennyson’s new play<sup>1</sup>. She had only read the first act—I had read three—but we both agreed we were still waiting for what was to come. Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Leopold dined. I sat by the Duchess of Roxburghe, a very pleasant and intelligent woman, and Lady Lansdowne. Prince Christian has asked me to stay with him to-day, so I shall not be back before to-morrow afternoon. I am to see the Queen again to-day at three, to give her the book.’

Not long after the Queen, through Prince Leopold, sent the Max Müllers the letter she had received from Mrs. Kingsley on the death of her husband, in answer to Her Majesty’s autograph letter. Mrs. Kingsley had the gift of letter-writing, and this letter to her Sovereign was worthy of the writer.

TO H.R.H. PRINCE LEOPOLD.

Translation.

OXFORD, July 22, 1875.

‘YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS,—I beg you to express to Her Majesty the Queen, in my name and the name of my wife, our heartfelt gratitude for allowing us to see that beautiful and most touching letter. Yes, so it was! I knew the little paradise of earthly happiness at Eversley, and the warm heart that beat there, a heart that was never closed to the highest or the lowest. I owe much, much to him. He was a friend to me, such as few have been in England. Our views were often far apart, but I never heard an irritable or hard word fall from his lips. One never felt any coldness in him. I saw him till nearly the end. I saw him when he believed that his wife, who was his very life, might die at any moment; saw him in his last illness, when he said, “The shot has gone home.” But all that he bore not merely with resignation, but with perfect calmness, with the feeling that it must be so, and not otherwise, in a spirit of which I thought he was incapable. He never knew fear, and as he had often leapt over a fence, he set himself as a brave rider and knight to leap the last fence—Death. I can still hear how he said, “I have never whimpered”; but one saw whence his courage came, and how in everything, great and small, he looked above, how his eyes soared above the little Present to the wide Hereafter.

‘His life had not been without clouds and storms. No one knows what demand he made on himself, in mind and body, how many years he had to labour for daily bread. The days of rest came too late, and it is very true what his widow says, he owed the brightest, sunniest days in his life to the kindness and the thoughtful care of his Queen. I saw Woolner's bust a few days ago; I hope it will be successful, but it is almost impossible to reproduce in marble so stormy a face as Kingsley's. Ennobled by death, his face was wonderfully reposeful and fine; one saw the ideal of the man, what he should be, what he wished to be. The world knew him only as stammering, helpless, breathless; he lay before one, purified, ennobled, and at rest. We must have not only a marble likeness of him, but a life of him. The description of a life often produces more effect than the life itself. But who shall write it? To write a true life demands the sacrifice of another life. I often felt that, in reading the life of your father. May I keep the letter a few days? My wife is at Taplow, and comes home on Saturday. She was very dear to Kingsley. He often said to me, "Next to my wife and children, I have loved no one so dearly as your wife." The prophecy, "After the Commemoration, the Deluge," seems to be true in Oxford. All the meadows are under water, and as I write it is all dark with thunder-clouds. Your Royal Highness must forgive me for writing in German—German often seems to come more from my heart than English, and I know how easily you speak and understand German.

<sup>1</sup> Queen Mary.

'I am, with deep respect,

'Your Royal Highness' obedient servant,

'F. MAX MÜLLER.'

It was in the early autumn of this year that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales (our present King) paid his visit to India. Dean Stanley was most anxious that Max Müller should be one of the suite, but, to the infinite relief of the Max Müllers, jealous John Bull decreed that no 'foreign influence' should accompany His Royal Highness.

TO DEAN STANLEY.

PARKS END, OXFORD, August 13, 1875.

'I guessed from your last letter what was going on. I wanted to write to you at once, not to stir in the matter, but I felt it was wrong to interfere. If the offer had been made, I believe I should have gone, unless I could have declined on the score of health. It would have been the greatest sacrifice I could have made at my time of life, giving up half a year of what remains to me of my happy life with my wife and children, but I should have looked upon it as sent, and meant for some good, and I hope and trust I should have done my duty. What good I could have done I hardly know; but we hardly ever know that—good comes from where we least expect it. However, I am grateful, truly grateful. My curiosity to see India is not very great. It is the inner life, not the outward show I care for; and I can see more of the former from reading books, newspapers, and letters, from seeing the men who come to see me here, than from fireworks and Durbars. I know I could have done nothing for the Prince in the way of amusement or anything else, but I believe in India my being with the Prince would here and there have produced a good impression. I can write no more to-day. Many thanks for what you have done. I never told my wife till this morning. I need not tell you what she felt, but she, too, said, "I should have let you go, if some good could have come of it."

TO THE SAME.

PARKS END, OXFORD, August 22, 1875.

'I am printing at present a volume of essays which is to form the fourth and concluding volume of my Chips from a German Workshop. The first was dedicated to Bunsen, the second to Bernays of Bonn, the third to Palgrave, and now I come to ask you whether you would allow me to inscribe your name on the last. It contains chiefly essays on the Science of Language, and also the Westminster Lecture, and with it your Sermon, and a postscript which I should like you to look at before it is struck off. You have been to me during my stay in England semper idem, and I know how much I owe you for many kind words spoken to me and of me. You trusted me even when I did not act as you wished, and you made allowance for the difficulties which a foreigner has in always recognizing the right line of action. But it is not only as a tribute of personal friendship that I ask you to accept the dedication of my book, but as a token of my sincere and warmest admiration for the noble fight you have been fighting all your life, through good and evil report, giving heart to others to follow, and securing to your country, after a thirty years' war, an amount of freedom of thought, and with it and through it, of sincerity of faith, such as no one could have dreamt of when I first came to Oxford in 1848. I think my time in England is nearly up. I doubt whether I ought to stay longer. I am only tolerated at Oxford, allowed to help when I am wanted, but never helped myself when I want help. If I had worked in Germany as I have worked for twenty-five years in England, my position would be very different. Here I am nobody in the University; and when I see how I am treated, I really feel sometimes ashamed of myself, not for my own, but for my wife's sake. However, it is my own fault. I would not give up a plan of life which I had made before I knew what life was. In order to carry out my edition of the Rig-veda, I had to expatriate myself—it was the only way of getting the work done. But now it is done, and the question is whether I can still be of use in my own country. I sometimes doubt it, but I think I ought to try. How different you must feel after having worked for your country as you have, and seeing the results of your work, and feeling certain of the gratitude of so many for whom you have spent your life.'

TO DR. ROLLESTON.

August 22.

'You Mezzofanti of all passages worth remembering, where is the passage that "the lightning of Jupiter strikes only the highest peaks"? I don't know what to make of Schliemann. I believe he is only giddy. I saw Gladstone for a moment the other day. He seemed hopeful about further diggings at Troy under Schliemann's auspices.'

TO THE SAME.

August 27.

'I have just read the poor abstract of your address<sup>1</sup> in the Times, and I hope soon to see it and read it in extenso. Your faith in skulls reminds me of my old friend Schwabe, at Dessau, whom I see mentioned honourably by one of your presidents. He was a very curious person, whose life ought to be written. Imagine a small town in the central desert of Germany, only discovered when they built a railroad to Leipzig. There he lived in a small house, with a hole in the roof to make his observations. How they laughed at him for registering the spots in the sun! They just tolerated him because he was a kind of wizard—could cure warts and that sort of thing—yet he was a most perfect gentleman, extremely well read in literature, first-rate botanist, &c. Well, now that he is dead, and he must have been past eighty, his measurements begin to tell, and I hope it may be so when you are eighty, and all that, but before humani aliquid has happened to you. By-the-by, you great Quotationist, you did not quote Terence rightly. The true meaning was given to that passage for the first time, as far as I know, by the Emperor Max of Germany. In Terence, surely, it only means "I am a great busybody, and every kind of gossip interests me"; but the Emperor gave a new meaning to it, and in that meaning you used it. I mention this because a saturnalian reviewer once abused me for having ascribed a passage from Terence to a German emperor!'

After his mother's return to Germany, Max Müller took his family to the Mumbles, the spit of land which forms the right horn of Swansea Bay, and they thoroughly enjoyed the primitive life of the little bathing-place. Their friends the Story-Maskelynes were staying at the adjoining bay, and many pleasant rambles were undertaken together. Before leaving home, Max Müller had finished the fourth volume of Chips, dedicated to Dean Stanley, 'as a token of gratitude and friendship from one who has for many years admired his loyalty to truth, his singleness of purpose, his chivalrous courage, and his unchanging devotion to his friends.' Of this volume, one review says:—

<sup>1</sup> British Association.

'The first thing one wants to know, in taking up one of Professor Max Müller's remarkable volumes, is how much one can understand; or rather—because his style is as limpid as his brain is clear—how much will be interesting. That his Science of Language will underlie the whole, may be guessed, to begin with: that the superstructure will in some places resemble a fortress, in others a fairy structure of light and graceful design, and in others a great cathedral—all this is well known before the book is opened. Whatever the fourth volume of Chips from a German Workshop contains, it is sure to be brimming over with great thoughts, lofty teaching, and the enthusiasm for things high and holy. The learned Professor has pondered over the literature of departed ages till he breathes himself the spirit of wisdom which has actuated the world's greatest men since men began to think, and must needs, perforce, teach whenever he opens his mouth to speak, or takes up his pen to write.'

The English head of one of the native colleges in India wrote of the Chips:—

'These volumes, embracing the minor works of Professor Müller, now first collected, comprise the very choicest of his writings. With few exceptions, they pertain directly to India. Most of them are critical; and their criticism is of a higher order than has been even approached by any English scholar that has dealt with the subjects of Hindu antiquity and literature.'

On returning to Oxford, the usual flow of correspondence began again.

TO PROFESSOR LEPSIUS.

PARKS END, October 8.

'... I have just finished Eber's Egyptian Princess. It is a most remarkable book, as a work of art as well as of history. It has quite astonished me. Whether it will do for England? A mere ordinary translation would not do—it would just ruin the book. It would have to be done by an expert hand, and here and there it would have to be shortened. It is very excellent. Ever yours.’

TO CHARLES DARWIN, ESQ.

OXFORD, October 13.

‘Allow me to present you my defence against Professor Whitney’s attacks. I think you will see from what I have stated, that Professor Whitney is not an ally whom either you or your son would approve of. I should never have noticed him, had not your son brought him so prominently before the English public. However, even controversy helps sometimes, though not often, to clear away error and bring out truth, and so I hope I have not simply wasted my time in answering Professor Whitney’s charges.

‘The point at issue between you and me is a very simple one: is that which can pass a certain line in nature the same as that which cannot? It may be, no doubt, and in that case the highest animal would simply be a stunted man. But this seems to me a narrow view of nature, particularly if we consider that everything organic is, after all, much more truly that which it can be, than that which it is. In the higher animals the potential traces of language are smaller than in some of the lower, but even where the phonetic organs are most perfect, there has never been the slightest attempt at language in the true sense of the word. Why should natural science be unwilling to admit this? Why should it not, at all events, leave the question an open question, until some truly scientific evidence has been brought forward, showing at least the potentiality of language in any known animal? “More facts and fewer theories” is what we want, at least in the Science of Language, and it is a misfortune if the collectors of facts are discouraged by being told that facts are useless against theories. I have no prejudice whatever against the faculty of language in animals, it would help to solve many difficulties. All I say is, let us wait, let us look for facts, and let us keep la carrière ouverte.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, October 9.

‘I hope you have used the money I sent to give yourself a little treat on your birthday. You could give yourself and others many happy hours, if you would, and if instead of dwelling on your own want of health, you thought of the far greater suffering others have to bear. Life must be as it is, and it is for the best without doubt, if we would only look upon it as such. Your health would be much better if you would not excite yourself over trifles. Strong as I am, I should soon be ill if I lived in the constant state of excitement in which you live. As one gets older, one learns to bear many things more quietly, for one feels that life is drawing to its close, and that there is much one cannot change. The lectures here begin soon, and our delightful free time is nearly over. I have to go to Manchester to distribute some prizes and make a speech. One can't refuse everything. Now, my dear mother, enjoy your birthday, and think of the many blessings you have had in life, and remember that we should learn through sorrows, so that we may leave this life without too much regret.'

Max Müller had been invited to present the Diplomas gained by the different schools in Lancashire at the Oxford and Cambridge Local Examinations. For this purpose he visited Manchester, where he was the guest of the Dean, at the end of October. It was a great distinction, and felt to be so by Max Müller, his predecessors having been Lord Derby, Lord Selborne, and other distinguished statesmen. The meeting was held in the Free Trade Hall, the audience numbering over 5,000. The Bishop, the Mayor, and the Members for Manchester were all present. In his address he mentioned the first attempt at examinations inaugurated in 1857 by the late Sir Thomas Acland, at which he had himself assisted. He described the efforts made by his own great-grandfather, the pedagogue Basedow, for elementary and middle-class education in Germany, and ended by advocating State-controlled rather than voluntary schools. This part of his speech called forth strong remonstrances from all Church papers, but it was a point on which he never wavered, though he always felt the necessity of religious, but unsectarian, teaching, such as he had himself been accustomed to as a child.

Max Müller had not long returned from Manchester before he decided that the time had come when he should do wisely to leave Oxford, and return to his own country.

TO DEAN STANLEY.

PARKS END, November 6.

'I send you a copy of my preface to Kingsley's Roman and Teuton, with some alterations here and there.

'I wish I could have seen you and had a quiet talk with you, before deciding on a step which, as you know, I have long contemplated. I hope I have decided rightly, though it was no easy matter to weigh everything. I have now served the University for exactly twenty-five years, and I have at last succeeded in gaining for the new Science of Language a recognized position among the subjects required or allowed in the examinations, and in leaving behind me a number of pupils, any of whom could fill my Chair with credit. As long as the University seemed to approve and appreciate my work, I was willing to stay and work on; and, for the sake of my wife and her friends, I gave up the Professorship offered me at Strassburg, which from a pecuniary point of view was as good as the one I hold here. I mean to go next April, and settle at first at Dresden. I shall have to work hard, as for some time I shall probably be without any official income. But even my wife agrees that I am right, and that I could not stay longer. If life is spared, I feel as if I could still do some work in my quiet retreat in Germany. When the time comes, no doubt it will be a wrench, for I leave many true friends behind, and I feel the sacrifice my wife has to make. I hope it will be for the good of the children. Nos amis les ennemis I have found a true saying many a time before—may it be so in this case also! Ever yours affectionately,

‘F. MAX MÜLLER.

‘I wish you could stay with us once more before we go. When shall we hear better news of Lady Augusta?’

TO PROFESSOR LEPSIUS.

Translation.

OXFORD, November 12.

‘... I remain here till Easter, then I think of taking a house in Dresden, and the remaining years will be entirely devoted to the Veda and to religious philosophy. I have still to print seven volumes of the translation of the Veda, not to mention other things, and the otium cum negotiis will do me much good. At all events, as Bunsen said, the bird is free! Do not yet mention it, however.’

Though Max Müller had not yet sent in his formal letter of resignation, his own friends and his wife’s relatives knew of his determination, and letters of expostulation and regret poured in on all sides. The following is inserted by permission, as representing what all those whose friendship Max Müller most valued, felt and expressed at the time:—

FROM REV. EDWIN PALMER.

JERUSALEM CHAMBER, November 12.

‘I must thank you for your kind letter, as I felt that I had been taking a considerable liberty in speaking my mind to you so freely. I can say nothing against a resolution to leave us based on considerations of your own strength, and the time required to finish the main work of your life. The loss to Oxford will be irremediable; but after all that you have done for us, we have certainly no right to complain. To say nothing of the prestige which your residence among us and your consent to be reckoned among our Professors has given us for so many years, I cannot but feel that all of us who have made Philology in any sense a special study, owe to you directly or indirectly all that they know, and indeed the very conception of the Science of Language. I will not attempt to speak of the personal loss to myself. It is quite true that there seemed to exist between us grave differences on some subjects connected with the politics of religion (if I may use that expression), perhaps differences on subjects strictly theological; but, in spite of these, I have always valued your friendship as highly as I have prized your intellectual gifts. Even now I cannot help cherishing a hope that you may reconsider your determination. The void which your absence from Oxford would make is too painful for me to contemplate.

I

K k

Believe me ever, yours affectionately,

‘EDWIN PALMER.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

OXFORD, November 21.

‘My speech at Manchester has excited people a good deal. In England nearly all the national schools are in the hands of the Church. That gives the clergy great influence over the children, and also over the parents, and therefore they do not wish to give them up. They naturally say it is so arranged that the religious instruction may be properly given, but the real reason is that they may maintain their political influence. If they could harm me, or at least do something to injure me, they would do so gladly; but I rejoice in their maledictions, as it shows I have produced some effect. Have you found a house for us, or shall I advertize for one? I have long wished for more leisure and quiet for work, and I cannot get it here, as I am so constantly interrupted by all sorts of people. I am tired of the life here, and we have enough to live independently without my taking any post.’

The following letter shows that Chips, Volume IV, was as popular as its three predecessors:—

FROM PROFESSOR HUXLEY.

4, MARLBOROUGH PLACE, November 29.

‘For a man who does not want to escape paying his creditors, there is a certain inconvenience in having three addresses. I am but rarely in Jermyn Street at this season, but on going there on Saturday I found the volume of Chips which you have been kind enough to send me. Accept my best thanks for it. I wish that the English workshops turned out even a few shavings of like character. Yours very truly,

‘THOMAS HUXLEY.’

On December 1 Max Müller sent his resignation to the Vice-Chancellor, the Warden of New College; writing also to his own Warden at All Souls to officially announce his determination, as the resignation of his Professorship entailed the loss of his Fellowship. He writes at this time to Dean Stanley: ‘I am very tired myself, and hardly able to do anything. It has been a hard struggle, and I only hope I have decided right.’ To George von Bunsen he writes: ‘Some things that kept me here are more difficult to leave than I thought at first.’

TO HIS MOTHER.

Translation.

December 6, 1875.

‘MY DEAR, GOOD MOTHER,—Only a few lines to tell you I have received your two letters, the second to-day for my birthday. Thank God, we are all well, and that is much at my age. Thanks for all your good wishes. Next year will be an important one; pray God that we have decided rightly. It was impossible to put off the decision on account of Wilhelm, who is still young enough to accustom himself to German life. I am very glad that it has come to this. My position here had become often very difficult, and the rest will do me good. I have much work still to do, if my strength lasts, and for this reason I desire to have what time may be left me for my special work. As to money, we must certainly retrench a little, but the children are provided for, and our whole interest is for them. Dresden seems to me the quietest place, and yet with all the advantages of a large city. If we find it too dear there, we must go to a smaller town; but, as I say, we shall have plenty to eat. The lamentations over our leaving are beginning. They have played me some shabby tricks, but now all has changed; but it is too late.’

TO WILLIAM LONGMAN, ESQ.

OXFORD, December 8.

‘I must tell you that I have sent in my resignation of the Chair of Comparative Philology, and that next year I intend to settle in Germany. I want to have all my time to myself. I have still much work in hand, which I wish if possible to finish, and I could not do it if I stay here.

‘I shall leave Oxford and England with a heavy heart, but, as life grows shorter, I felt more and more that I was wasting it in doing work which others could do as well, or even better; while I had to leave undone work which I could do, and ought to do. I shall probably go in April; before that time I hope to have finished my book on Language as the True Barrier between Man and Beast.’

No sooner had the announcement of Max Müller’s retirement appeared in the papers, than letters poured in from every part of the world, whilst all the chief English papers had leading articles on his work. He was by no means prepared for such an outburst of genuine feeling on all sides, and was deeply touched by it. At the same time letters came from Vienna and many German Universities, from Florence, and even from Bucharest, trying to secure his services.

TO H.R.H. THE DUKE OF ALBANY.

PARKS END, OXFORD, December 13, 1875.

‘SIR,—I was able to say so very little when your Royal Highness gave me that beautiful souvenir, that I must try whether I cannot express my gratitude in better words. The happy hours which I have been allowed to spend with your Royal Highness will always remain among my most cherished recollections of dear old Oxford. I was often afraid that an old German Professor could hardly be a pleasant companion to one so young, so bright, and generally so happy as your Royal Highness. Still, I believe few people could have watched your career at Oxford with deeper interest, and felt for you, both in health and sickness, a truer sympathy than I have. I hope and trust that the dark clouds which surrounded your youth may now have disappeared altogether, though I cannot say that I wish your Royal Highness a perfectly cloudless sky; for, after all, the cloudy sky of England is more beautiful really than the cloudless sky of Italy, and a life without dark shadows is generally a very shallow and useless life. What I hope and wish for you is an active and useful career, and, before all, that physical strength which alone is wanting to enable you to make that excellent and unselfish use of your high position and talents which I know you are determined to make of them, if you can.

‘Fortes creantur fortibus et bonis. . . .’

‘The last weeks, when I had finally to decide on my leaving Oxford, have been full of trouble and sorrow to me, and I cannot thank your Royal Highness enough for the unexpected token of your kind feelings towards me : it was like a bright and warm ray of light on a dreary day. No one knows how fond I am of Oxford, and what a sacrifice I make in leaving it and leaving England. But the life of a scholar has its duties, and I must not shrink from them. As Professor I have no sphere of usefulness here. "The young men do not belong to the Professor, nor the Professor to the young men"—that is what Mr. Bonamy Price says in his last pamphlet, and what I have felt for years. As long as the edition of the Veda kept me here, I had an excuse for staying at Oxford, though I felt often depressed when I saw how I had to fritter away my time in trying to serve two masters, Sanskrit and the Science of Language.

'But now, when the edition of the Veda is finished, and even the Chips gathered up, my desire to continue my translation of the Veda, and to work out some of the results to which my study of the sacred writings of the ancient world had led me, became stronger and stronger. Yet I felt that I could no longer work as I had done hitherto, and if I had continued to discharge my duties as Professor of Comparative Philology, I should have had to surrender my Sanskrit studies altogether. Were I Professor of Sanskrit at Oxford, nothing would have drawn me away from this, in many respects, delightful place ; but, in order to concentrate my powers, and to do something at least before it is too late, I see no choice but to give up my pleasant position here, and retire to some quiet town in Germany. . . .

'The dark cloud has been hanging over my head for the last fifteen years, and as a man who stands under a waterfall is little disturbed by a few rain-drops, the puṇḍrāḥ inīriolāḥ were nothing compared to the weighty considerations which determined my course.

'A rumour (and Oxford is famous for its Common-roomers) says that I have accepted a lucrative position in Germany. It is simply untrue. A lucrative position was offered me in Germany, and I declined it. No one seems able to see that science, too, has its duties, or to believe that a scholar can make a sacrifice for the sake of his work. Now, I believe that the Veda is an extremely important book, in fact the only book in Indian literature which is important, not only for India, but for the early history of the whole Âryan race, including Greeks, Romans, and ourselves. It contains the first attempts at expressing religious thought and feeling, and it alone can help us to solve many of the most critical problems in the Science of Religion. The Science of Religion is, in fact, the history of all religions, and when I saw, as quite a young man, the gap in our materials for studying the origin and growth of religious ideas, because no one knew then or could know what the Veda was, I determined to devote my life to collecting all the manuscripts that could still be found, and thus to rescue the oldest book of our race from that destruction which would have been inevitable, unless it had been printed. This has now been done. People do not yet see the full importance of the Veda in an historical study of religion, and yet I feel convinced that the true solution of many of our theological difficulties—difficulties that will become far more terrible than they are at present—is to be found in the study of the history of all religions. We shall then see what is essential and what is accidental, what is eternal and what is human handiwork; among all the possibilities displayed before us, we shall in the end discover the reality of religion, just as a study of the movements of all celestial bodies led in the end to the discovery of a law that supported them all.

‘If I stayed at Oxford as Professor of Comparative Philology, I could not hope to finish even my translation of the Veda, much less to work out at least a few of the results of thirty years’ study. That is why I leave Oxford to settle in some quiet town in Germany, and there to devote myself to the education of my children and to my Sanskrit studies. My friends think me Quixotic, even reckless. I cannot help it. All I can say is, and I know your Royal Highness will agree with me, Life is precious, and we must try to make the best use of it we can.

‘I have been proud for years to call myself, while living and working in England, a loyal subject of Her Majesty the Queen. I hope I shall be so still, even when living and working in Germany. While in England I have tried to make my English friends understand and appreciate all that is good and noble in the German character; when in Germany I shall try to make my German friends understand and appreciate what is good and noble in the English character.

‘I have sometimes succeeded in England—I hope I may succeed in Germany, for the estrangement between England and Germany is deplorable, and fraught, I fear, with serious danger. Again thanking your Royal Highness for the many proofs of your kindness,

‘I have the honour to remain, with sincere gratitude,

‘Your Royal Highness’s most faithful servant,

‘F. MAX MÜLLER.’

In a letter to his mother of December 19, Max Müller says that he longs for rest, rest to work at what really interests him. He also tells her that he has just received the Maximilian Order from Bavaria, and that it is more showy than the Order pour le Mérite, 'but that is the best.' He felt each day that, if freed from his Oxford lectures, he could yet do much good work, for he was true to his first love Sanskrit, and what it had led to, the study of ancient religions, but his lectures in addition were too much for his strength.

TO E. FREEMAN, ESQ.

OXFORD, December.

'As to politics, all I meant to say was that it was dangerous to egg the present Government on to any action in the Eastern Question. Lord Derby is the same as he was at the time of the Cretan insurrection—feelings of humanity are to him, as a politician, mere sentimentality. That Cretan business is the most horrible chapter in modern history. Did you ever read Stillman's book? I tried to review it in the Times, but nearly all the really damaging passages were cut out. If Lord Derby thinks he has done something and enough, I believe that is the best thing that could happen just now.

'I look upon myself as a true Anglian. My Sovereign, the reigning Duke of Anhalt, is Duke of Engern. See Chips, III, p. 123.'

On December 22 he writes to Dr. Pauli: 'I want at least a couple of years' rest, for I feel rather shaken.'

TO C. E. MATHEWS, ESQ.

OXFORD, December 15.

'Yes, I am going. I feel more and more that I am not wanted at Oxford, and at my time of life one does not like to feel that one is on sufferance only. My old friends are nearly all gone, and the treatment I receive here is not exactly what I like. I want rest in order to finish some work before it is too late. I shall go in April to Germany to look out for a house, and take my family over in June or July.'

Towards the close of the year Max Müller brought out in Germany a little volume of the letters from Schiller to the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein. It was known that many letters had passed between the poet and his generous patron, but it was believed they had been destroyed. His Royal Highness Prince Christian succeeded in discovering part of the correspondence, which he entrusted to Max Müller for publication.

TO H.R.H. PRINCE LEOPOLD.

PARKS END, December 28, 1875.

'SIR,—The little book containing Schiller's correspondence with the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein (the grandfather of H.R.H. Prince Christian) was only the small end, and as your Royal Highness has accepted it so kindly, I venture to send to-day what indeed will seem the wedge, four stout bundles of Chips. I do not ask you to read them, in fact I always feel ashamed when I present any of my books, for it is like asking one's friends to listen for an hour or more to one's uninterrupted talk, it is making oneself a great bore. But what is a poor author to do who wishes, if not to be read, at least to be shelved? Now all I really ask is a place on the shelves of your library. I know I shall be in good company, and if in some idle hour—and no life is tolerable without some idle hours—your Royal Highness should open one of these volumes, perhaps they will remind you of one who, when returned to his native country, will always remember with gratitude the happy years which he spent in the country of his choice, and who has only to think of the great kindness which he received when he least expected it, in order to forget the little unkindnesses which, after all, no one can escape. My friends at Oxford are now doing all they can to keep me here, but I believe I have decided rightly, and I owe it to my enemies that they have helped me to a right decision.

'Florence was very tempting. Vienna, too, held out very attractive offers, but I believe I shall remain faithful to what the Germans somewhat conceitedly call Elb-Florenz, i.e. Dresden. There is one attraction which I have little doubt will sooner or later bring your Royal Highness to Dresden, that is Raphael's Madonna, a picture totally different from all other pictures, and quite worth a journey by itself.

'Your Royal Highness's very faithful servant,
'F. MAX MÜLLER.'

We cannot close the memories of this year without adverting to an event in Oxford which was of great interest to the Max Müllers, the foundation and opening of the Girls' Day School by the Public Day School Company. All through this year Max Müller did all he could to promote the scheme, attending all the meetings and taking shares, he having found by experience how unsatisfactory teaching at home by one governess generally is.

His own three girls were among the first twenty-five scholars with which the school opened, and the other girls were almost all of them their intimate friends. They soon became devoted to their school; the eldest girl was the first Prefect, and among the many reasons that made Max Müller's children feel intensely the idea of leaving Oxford and their loved home the loss of their school was very prominent.

Christmas, the last, as was thought, in the old home, was a sad one, though kept with the usual tree, to which Max Müller always invited all the Germans living in Oxford.

END OF VOL. I

OXFORD: HORACE HART PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

WORKS

BY THE

RT. HON. FRIEDRICH MAX MÜLLER.

---

COLLECTED WORKS.

18 Vols. Crown 8vo, 5s. each.

VOL. I. NATURAL RELIGION: the Gifford Lectures, 1888.

VOL. II. PHYSICAL RELIGION: the Gifford Lectures, 1890.

VOL. III. ANTHROPOLOGICAL RELIGION: the Gifford Lectures, 1891.

VOL. IV. THEOSOPHY; or, Psychological Religion: the Gifford Lectures, 1892.

CHIPS FROM A GERMAN WORKSHOP.

VOL. V. RECENT ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES.

VOL. VI. BIOGRAPHICAL ESSAYS.

VOL. VII. ESSAYS ON LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

VOL. VIII. ESSAYS ON MYTHOLOGY AND FOLK-LORE.

---

VOL. IX. THE ORIGIN AND GROWTH OF RELIGION, as Illustrated by the Religions of India: the Hibbert Lectures, 1878.

VOL. X. BIOGRAPHIES OF WORDS, AND THE HOME OF THE ÂRYAS.

VOLS. XI, XII. THE SCIENCE OF LANGUAGE: Founded on Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution in 1861 and 1863. 2 vols. 10s.

VOL. XIII. INDIA: What can it Teach Us?

VOL. XIV. INTRODUCTION TO THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION. Four Lectures, 1870.

VOL. XV. RÂMAKRISHNA: his Life and Sayings.

VOL. XVI. THREE LECTURES ON THE VEDÂNTA PHILOSOPHY, 1894.

VOL. XVII. LAST ESSAYS. First Series. Essays on Language, Folk-lore, &c.

VOL. XVIII. LAST ESSAYS. Second Series. Essays on the Science of Religion.

---

LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.
LONDON, NEW YORK, AND BOMBAY.

WORKS

BY THE

RT. HON. FRIEDRICH MAX MÜLLER.

---

THE SCIENCE OF THOUGHT. 8vo. 21s.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE SCIENCE OF MYTHOLOGY. 2 vols. 8vo. 32s.

THE SIX SYSTEMS OF INDIAN PHILOSOPHY. 8vo. 18s.

AULD LANG SYNE. First Series. 8vo. [Out of print.
CONTENTS.—Musical Recollections—Literary Recollections—Recollections of Royalties—Beggars.

AULD LANG SYNE. Second Series. My Indian Friends. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

DEUTSCHE LIEBE (GERMAN LOVE): Fragments from the Papers of an Alien. Collected by F. MAX MÜLLER. Translated from the German by G. A. M. Crown 8vo. 5s.

MY AUTOBIOGRAPHY. A Fragment. With 6 Portraits. 8vo. 12s. 6d.

CONTENTS.—Introductory—Childhood at Dessau—School-days at Leipzig—University—Paris—Arrival in England—Early Days at Oxford—Early Friends at Oxford—A Confession.

HANDBOOKS FOR THE STUDY OF SANSKRIT.

THE SANSKRIT TEXT OF THE FIRST BOOK OF THE HITOPADESA. 3s. 6d.

THE SECOND, THIRD AND FOURTH BOOKS OF THE HITOPADESA; containing that Sanskrit Text, with Interlinear Translation. 7s. 6d.

---

LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

LONDON, NEW YORK, AND BOMBAY.

(14)

22.3

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

---

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

---

